The Boston University War Record

SOON after the signing of the armistice, in 1918, the National Government requested the colleges and universities of the country to prepare an official record of their war activities. In response to this request the Trustees of Boston University authorized the preparation of such a record and made an appropriation to defray the cost of publication. It was decided to include in the volume the war record of every person who at any time had been a member of the university body.

In accordance with this decision, forty thousand questionnaires were mailed. The response was unexpectedly large. Over three thousand questionnaires were filled out and returned.

Undoubtedly, very many, especially those mailed to the men at the front, failed to reach the persons addressed. Every effort was subsequently made to reach these men. Newspaper clues were followed; many letters were written to friends and relatives of the men who had failed to report. After the return of the troops from abroad, a second questionnaire was forwarded to the home address of those who had failed to receive the first. These subsidiary efforts secured several hundred belated questionnaires.

In the printed data certain items are preceded by an asterisk. This asterisk indicates that the information was not directly furnished by the person concerned but that the source seemed sufficiently authentic to warrant the inclusion of the data. All material not marked by an asterisk was furnished directly by the persons concerned.

In editing the Record, difficulties were encountered in deciphering the French proper names. Written in the very trenches, and prepared by the writers amid indescribable difficulties, it is not surprising that the words were in many cases illegible. Wherever the best available atlases furnished a clue the names have been correctly printed. Scores of names, however, are not found in these atlases; these names were submitted to several persons in an endeavor to ascertain the correct spelling. It is too much to hope that absolute accuracy has been attained.

Another difficulty was found in editing the data submitted: in many questionnaires the years of the various events cited were manifestly inconsistent and wrong. Some of these dates would indicate that men were discharged from the service a year or more before they enlisted. Wherever it was possible an attempt was made by personal letters to clear up the confusion. In other cases it was necessary by editing to introduce consistency into the data.

The mass of material submitted was so great that it was found absolutely necessary to condense many of the reports. The work of condensation was entrusted to a former army officer with instructions to retain everything essential and to reduce so far as possible the data to a uniform style of notation. Some may feel that the condensation has been carried to an unwarranted extreme. It will cause genuine regret to the editorial staff if any injustice has been done. The need of condensation was absolute; the work was entrusted to a careful man who has an intimate acquaintance with military matters and who served with high distinction at the front.

The preparation of so large a volume was necessarily the work of many persons, cooperating through many months. No effort to secure exactness was regarded by the editorial staff as too great, yet it is inevitable that errors should creep into a work so detailed. All corrections brought to our attention will be carefully noted.

The literary portion of the volume is of permanent value and much of it is of absorbing interest. The articles as a whole form a genuine contribution to the history of the World War. The Trustees of the University have liberally and cordially supported the editorial staff in the preparation of the volume. To all who have contributed in any way to this war record of Boston University the editors express their sincere and abiding thanks.

Boston, September 10, 1920.

THE SECOND DIVISION IN THE BATTLE OF CHÂTEAU-THIERRY

Stephen Warren Brethorst

[Stephen Warren Brethorst, a graduate of the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University, '20, was a captain in the Fifth Regiment, United States Marines, American Expeditionary Forces.]

CHÂTEAU-THIERRY is a name rather loosely applied to a series of operations which took place between the Vesle and the Marne Rivers from June 1 to the first of August, 1918. These operations, as far as the Second American Division is concerned, may be divided into two phases: first, that which was comprehended in pinning down the German advance on Paris and in making the offensive about Belleau Wood between June 1 and June 26; second, the counter-offensive launched by Marshal Foch from July 18 to the first of August.

In this short article I shall endeavor to portray the human elements of sacrifice, fortitude, and suffering, for I realize that a mere sketch of the main features of an engagement is like the rough outline of a picture before the artist has added the colors and the proportions of life.

During the last days of May, 1918, the armies of General Ludendorff, flushed with their victories of March and April, had swept the French and the Scotch from the strongly fortified positions of the Chemin-des-Dames, and, pressing back the remnants of what was once a French Army, were marching on Paris with little or no opposition.

The Second Division, commanded by Maj.-Gen. Omar Bundy, and later by Maj.-Gen. James G. Harboard, was unique in that it was a composite force of the army and the navy. It consisted of a brigade of marines, a brigade of infantry, and a brigade of artillery. Seasoned by months of arduous service in trench warfare near Verdun, it was held in reserve near Amiens awaiting the German offensive, which the Allied High Command had been deceived into believing would be launched against the British Army.

At ten o'clock on the night of Memorial Day the division received orders to entrain on camions and proceed eastward to meet the German advance which was threatening the gates of Paris. Their course took them through the threatened city, where they learned of the seriousness of the situation and of the evacuation of the city. As the miles of camions passed by, the crowds became enthusiastic and demonstrative, for they well knew that on this group of men depended the very safety of their homes. The advance north from Paris was over roads almost impassable from numberless ambulances, motor lorries, fleeing fugitives, and retreating troops. During the last hours thousands of refugees were passed,—old and gray-haired men and women, mothers with babes on their arms, or at their side, children crying for food or because they were too weary and foot-sore to go further. The few personal effects that they had been able to collect hurriedly were loaded on baby-carriages or wagons, for only a few fortunate ones had succeeded in getting away with a horse and cart. The earnings of a lifetime and all that they held dear were left for the vandal Huns to devastate. The memory of these stricken and suffering people no doubt sustained the boys through the superhuman tasks of the next few days.

At five o'clock on the morning of June 1 the division detrained and began the hike to Montreuil, although they had been without food or sleep for forty-eight hours. Orders were received from the French Staff to retreat to the Marne, but General Bundy sent back the memorable reply which will be told to future generations,— "The American Flag knows not retreat."

As the columns swung up the road, the boys began singing their popular song, "Over There." The words of the refrain, "We 'll not come back till it 's over over HERE " were words not of the lips only but of the heart. The French troops, remnants of what was once an army, were moving to the rear by twos, squads, and hundreds, in no semblance of an orderly retreat, but nothing less than a rout. The sight of the happy Americans, who were soon to prove themselves terrible in battle, seemed to revive in them the old spirit which saved Verdun,— "They shall not pass,"— and soon dots of horizon blue appeared in the ranks of the olive drab. At Montreuil the regiments moved forward on parallel roads to meet the enemy. At dusk the advance guards exchanged shots. The armies threw out skirmish lines and awaited the dawn of a momentous day.

It was the first day of June, a day which never shall be forgotten. The sun rose in gloom and black disaster. But the sun set that night upon a world redeemed. At dawn wave after wave of the steel gray came over the hills and through the valleys, closely following a terrific barrage, but under the accurate fire of the boys in olive drab the lines went down as grain before a sickle. All that day and the next three days there was grappling hand to hand, cold steel meeting cold steel.

The situation was and continued to be most adverse. The Germans had complete control of the air, their machine guns and infantry held the most strategic woods, while their artillery crowned the hills and dominated the terrain for miles. No troops could be moved, no provisions or supplies transported, and no work done by day without drawing a terrific artillery fire or a volley of bombs from the low-flying enemy planes. For six weeks not a hot meal was served at the front, yet the morale of the troops was unshaken.

To improve the situation, General Harboard, commanding the brigade of marines, ordered an attack on Belleau Wood and the town of Boureches. At five o'clock on the evening of June 6 the marines advanced across the open wheat fields serene and confident. The echelons, with their fixed bayonets sparkling in the sun, moved forward rapidly but surely. It looked more as though it were a dress parade in Washington than an advance to almost certain death. Minute by minute the ordered lines melted away under the deluge of high explosives, shrapnel, rifle, and machine-gun fire, but they would not be denied their objectives. Boureches was captured and also a footing gained in the southern edge of Belleau Wood. Territory six kilometers in length and two kilometers in depth was wrested from the enemy.

To show the nature of this wooded warfare I cite one small incident that occurred on the morning of June 7. Three companies of one battalion had failed to get through on the previous evening, and this left a gap of half a kilometer in the American lines in Belleau Wood. The Germans, realizing this, sent a patrol with a machine gun through the gap in an effort to bag the few Americans. This was reported to the officer in command by a scout from the outpost. Only immediate action could save the little force of marines from annihilation or capture, and the Wood from again falling into the hands of the enemy. The officer, with five non-commissioned officers, slipped out to intercept the Hun patrol. They had gone less than fifty paces when suddenly two of the Fritzes came bounding over the rocks, landing directly in their midst. They made a dash for cover, and not heeding the command to halt, fell riddled ere they had gone ten paces. The entire enemy patrol then opened fire and all sought cover. Regular Indian style warfare followed, leaping from tree to tree and from stone to stone. The marines were expert shots, and when Heinie's head, encased in a steel helmet, appeared above the rocks or around a tree, he received a well-placed bullet. Four of them, deciding to seek safety in flight, went bounding over the rocks as frightened deer pursued by hounds. The pieces of steel they were courting sped on their mission of love. As rabbits whirl in air on being shot, so did these Fritzes as they emitted the familiar death shriek.

From that time on the marines were heavily engaged up to June 27. Despite terrible casualties, they made subsequent attacks on this Wood, and finally it fell completely into their hands, the enemy retiring to the hills north and east. Over a thousand prisoners and many machine guns were captured in this long campaign.

Belleau Wood and Boureches became a regular hell. The stench from the unburied American and German dead made life here unbearable. Hour after hour, day and night, with increasing intensity as the time passed, the enemy rained heavy shells into this area. The church at Boureches stood up a broken tooth of masonry among the shattered houses, with an amphitheater of splintered woods behind and around it.

The ninth and twenty-third regiments of infantry were supporting the marines during these weeks, but on July 1 they attacked and captured Vaux in a magnificent frontal attack. The best proof of the intensity of the fighting is shown by the fact that the losses of the marine brigade during these four weeks was 5,199 in killed or wounded.

It was a heavy price we paid, but can it be said that it was not well paid, not only in military results but in proof to our country and to the world that these raw troops from the New World were the equals of the best?

Was this action at Belleau Wood decisive? Did it supply the necessary resistance to the German drive, when other reserves were lacking? Yes; this is the opinion in France as well as in America, and is the verdict of many military men, who hold that these four regiments on the road to Paris were the last barrier between Ludendorff and Paris.

The villages of Boureches and Vaux and Belleau Wood, known now and forever as the "Wood of the American Marines," will be places of American pilgrimage for years.

The relief of the Second Division by the Twenty-sixth New England Division was entirely completed on July 10, and the Second Division was withdrawn to reserve lines for replacements and rest with the consciousness of having established a remarkable record.

Having been thwarted in his attempt to take Paris in June, Ludendorff began on July 15 a stupendous effort to cross the Marne, capture Dormans and the railroads feeding Verdun, and then march on the French capital. To meet this new attack Marshal Foch decided to launch a counter-offensive at the upper end of the V-shaped salient which extended from the Aisne to the Marne.

The Second Division received orders on the morning of July 16 to proceed to the rear. Forced marching brought them to Cruitz, where they entrained on camions which were drawn up under cover of trees which the sharp eyes of the enemy aviators could not pierce.

The camions moved off with the human cannon fodder—whither, no one knew. Utmost secrecy being necessary, they detoured through Meaux, but finally turned north towards Villers Cotterets and there dumped their load of human freight. Without food or rest, and miserable from the eighteen hours' ride, the regiments were formed and marched northward. At dusk the officers of each regiment were assembled and informed that an attack would be made at 4.24 in the morning. A lady wearing a uniform of blue with the insignia of the red triangle appeared with a Ford truck and issued cookies, a cake of chocolate, and a package of cigarettes to each man. Who will not agree that these women,— nurses, Red Cross and Y. W. C. A. workers, and Salvation Army lasses,— blessed with a spirit of sacrifice and love of service, are God's greatest gift to man? Through all those terrible, dark hours of the night, during a pouring rain, the ranks plodded on in single file. To keep the column from being broken each man was forced to grip the man ahead, for only by an occasional flash of lightning could the line or road be seen. The course led through a densely wooded region where the trees over-arched the road. A line of supply trucks, wagons, and artillery was drawn up in the center of the road. On the right, moving toward Soissons, was a column of ambulances, ration wagons, and trucks with ammunition; on the left a column of empty lorries, wagons, and caissons, moving to the rear. After five agonizing hours of crawling under trucks, carts, and mules, the line pressed through the three miles of congested traffic.

Hundreds of the plucky but over-taxed lads had "fallen out" on the hike, some never to see the dawn of another day. Many who were thrown under the wheels of the moving traffic lay mangled on the roads. Others, with the print of a mule's foot visible on their bodies, lay stiff and cold by the side of the road, while still others who had fallen over the steep embankments were suffering intense pain from bruises and broken limbs. The drenched men were nearly exhausted, and barely reached their jumping-off place at the zero hour. Some companies were forced to double time for several miles.

Following closely a rolling barrage, the most terrific in the history of the war, these boys who had had no sleep or rest for two days and two nights went "over the top," preceded by French tanks, just south of Soissons. In five hours they had driven the German forces from the plateau commanding Vierzy. At seven o'clock in the evening they again moved forward and crossed the Soissons-

Paris railway, capturing Vierzy after heavy fighting and severe losses. They stopped only at Vigny, where they dug in about midnight, to await daylight and the resumption of the attack.

The battlefield, illuminated by the flames of burning tanks, by Very Lights which were in ever-increasing number piercing the cold, damp air, and by immense star shells dropped by enemy planes hovering overhead, revealed little groups of medical men at work ministering to the wounded. Lads with bodies torn and mangled, muscles stiff from the damp, chilly air, and lips parched with thirst, were suffering pain which only a battlefield knows. As he writes this on the first anniversary of that glorious day, the author can still clearly hear those agonizing and heart-rending cries of "First Aid" and "Stretcher Bearers" as they were wafted over the field every minute of every hour of that terrible night.

This counter-stroke between Soissons and Château-Thierry may be termed in all fairness decisive. The First American Division with the Second, supported by the famous Singlese shock troops, broke the hinge of the salient south of Soissons — a task stupendous, of which the far-reaching consequences, perhaps, cannot be justly estimated for years.

THE MARINES IN FRANCE

J. Duncan Mac Nair

[Chaplain James Duncan MacNair is a graduate of the College of Liberal Arts, '05, and of the School of Theology, '05. He has served as chaplain in the United States Navy in many places, and saw service in France from October, 1917, to July, 1918. He holds the rank of lieutenant in the navy.]

WHEN the United States declared war on Germany, in April, 1917, the question arose: how soon can we get our forces to the Western Front in Europe? France, England, and the other allies were war-weary and discouraged. For nearly three years they had been fighting a foe who seemed as though he could not be beaten; in fact, it was almost feared that he would win. However, the entry of the United States into the great World War made it certain that the Central Powers would eventually be defeated. There were many problems to be met by our country, and among these was the one of sending our men across the Atlantic. Yet within a few weeks after war was declared our soldiers began to embark for Europe. In June the first contingent of marines was in France, and by the first of January, 1918, two regiments and two machine-gun battalions were ready and anxious to go into intensive training for the front.

The 5th and 6th Regiments of Marines, together with the Machine-Gun Battalions, were made the 4th Brigade of the 2d Division of the American Army. The 5th Regiment was commanded by Colonel Neville and the 6th by Colonel Catlin, the Brigade Commander being General Doyen, who was relieved in the early part of May by General Harboard.

On March 15 we left our training area, which was to the east of Chaumont and south of Neufchâteau. After a fifteen or sixteen hour trip on a slow-moving train, we arrived at Dugny, a small town to the south of Verdun, where we disembarked for the trenches. The position assigned us was in the High Meuse, southeast of Verdun, between a point near Les Eparges on the south and Ronvaux to the north. We were at first put in with the French, but later were left to hold the front line alone. During our two months' stay here the division was under the tutelage of the French. We lived in dugouts, and had there been neither rats nor cooties we should have been fairly comfortable. There was plenty of artillery fire and quite a number of raids by either side. The aeroplanes were always busy and the anti-aircraft guns were in constant use. In the morning of April 14 the Germans began to shell the little ravine of St. Robert, and in two hours had sent over about three thousand shells, sixteen hundred of which were gas. The 74th Company of Marines was billeted in the ravine, and a large number of its men were gassed.

We left the trenches on the night of May 13 for a rest area west of Revigny, and five days later were ordered to another northwest of Paris. Here we remained until May 31. On May 30 we were ordered to be ready to depart for the front at six o'clock, the hour being later changed to ten, but the motor lorries did not begin to arrive until four o'clock in the morning of the 31st. When we came to the last rest area we all felt sure that the division was to be put in on the Somme or at Montdidier, but the drive by the German Army of the Crown Prince, which swept over the Chemin-des-Dames and advanced down the Marne Valley, getting nearer and nearer to Paris by eight and ten kilometers a day, evidently changed the plans of the Allied High Command, for the 2d Division of the American Army was hurried to the east of Paris to a point on the Paris-Metz road west of Château-Thierry. The division had traveled nearly eighty miles in springless trucks over dusty roads, but the men, although weary, were ready and anxious to get into the fray.

Before proceeding further it may be well to state of what units our division was composed. The 9th and 23d Regiments of Infantry made up the 3d Brigade, the 5th and 6th Regiments of Marines with the 6th Machine Gun Battalion the 4th Brigade, and then came the 12th, 15th, and 17th Artillery, the 2d Engineers, the Signal Corps, and the Supply Train — 27,000 men in all.

In the morning of June 1 we were told that the division was to go into line immediately and to hold at all costs. The line was simply an ever-moving line separating the French from the Germans. The Germans were less than forty miles from Paris and felt sure at last it was within their grasp, but "there 's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," and the coveted prize was never taken. The position that was taken up was from a point a short way from Château-Thierry to a hill between Marigny and Torcy. The line ran through Le Thiolet, Bois des Clerembauts, Triangle Farm, and Lucy le Bocage to the Bois de Veuilly. On the left came the 23d, then a battalion of the 5th, two battalions of the 6th, and to the right the 9th Regiment of Infantry. We formed our line back of the retreating French and they passed through our lines, leaving us face to face with the German Army. On the afternoon of June 2 our division came into contact with the enemy. Here I will quote from Colonel Catlin's book, "With the Help of God and a Few Marines" (pages 92-94):

The attack was launched against the French who had remained in front of Wise's battalion of the Fifth at Hill 165. It started about 5 o'clock in the afternoon and came from the north and northeast. It was a beautiful, clear day, and from my post of observation at La Voie du Châtel I could watch the whole of it.

The Germans swept down an open slope in platoon waves, across wide wheat-fields bright with poppies that gleamed like splashes of blood in the afternoon sun. The French met the attack and then fell steadily back. First I saw the French coming back through the wheat, fighting as they came. Then the Germans, in two columns, steady as machines. To me as a military man it was a beautiful sight. I could not but admire the precision and steadiness of those waves of men in gray with the sun glinting on their helmets. On they came, never wavering, never faltering, apparently irresistible.

But they were not irresistible. Back of the French was a force they had not reckoned on, a force as steady and confident as themselves. It was that battalion of the Fifth Marines on our left.

At the right moment the Americans opened up with a slashing barrage. Shrapnel, machine gun, and rifle fire were poured into those advancing lines. It was terrible in its effectiveness. The French told us that they had never seen such marksmanship practised in the heat of battle. If the German advance looked beautiful to me, that metal curtain that our marines rang down on the scene was even more so.

The German lines did not break; they were broken. The Boches fell by the scores there among the wheat and the poppies.

They hesitated, they halted, they withdrew a space. Then they came on again. They were brave men; we must grant them that. Three times they tried to reform and break through that barrage, but they had to stop at last. The United States Marines had stopped them. Thus repulsed, with heavy losses, they retired, but our fire was relentless; it followed them to their death. They broke and ran for cover, though their first line hung on till dark, north of Champillon.

Then, mercilessly, methodically, we shelled the woods where they had taken refuge. A French aviator who sailed overhead saw one entire battalion annihilated there, and signaled back "Bravo" to our gunners.

It was a terrible slaughter; the mere thought of such wholesale killing is enough to curdle Christian blood. But we had whipped the Hun. We had turned that part of his advance into a rout. We had tasted his blood and we had not forgotten the blood of our own who had been slain. We had won our first fight there where fighting meant so much, and it would not have been human to refrain from cheering when it was over.

On June 6 began the attack on Belleau Wood, a woods one mile and a quarter long by a quarter to a half mile wide, which did not end until the woods was cleared of the Germans and their machine-gun nests. During the month of June the marines not only had stopped the big German drive on Paris, but also had taken Boureches and Belleau Wood, and the division had driven the enemy back, held Vaux, and also a line from that place to a point not far from Torcy. The 26th Division began to relieve the 2d on July 4.

The 2d Division, although it did not get into the actual battle line first, yet suffered more casualties, captured more prisoners and booty, covered more territory, and was engaged in more major operations than any other division of the American Expeditionary Force.

Of the marines it can be truly said that to their heroic work a great part of this honor is due. Wherever a marine is placed he does his full duty, for he is imbued with the spirit of the words of the Marine Hymn:

"In many a strife we have fought for life,
And never lost our nerve."

OUR AIR SERVICE IN THE WAR

Robert F. Raymond, Jr.

[Captain Robert F. Raymond, Jr., a student in the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University in 1915, served in the aviation corps in the Toul and Château-Thierry sectors. For his brilliant work he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross.]

OF all branches of the army, the air service has received the most criticism. This is partly due to the fact that this branch, appealing as it does to the imagination of all, had from its earliest days an over-amount of publicity, causing Mr. Average Citizen to expect of it accomplishments which were beyond all possibilities of realization. It is due also to the fact that for material we were dependent, even to the end, upon the over-taxed resources of our allies. The achievements of the air service, thus handicapped, were nothing short of remarkable. With nothing of equipment or personnel with which to make a start, a force was built up which, at the close of the war, was only surpassed by the Royal Air Force of Britain and the Imperial Force of Germany.

No account, however brief, of our aerial activities would be complete without mention of the Lafayette Escadrille, that courageous group of American volunteers who flew and fought for France before our belated entry into the war. Their individual exploits will furnish material for romance for many years to come. A fitting sequel to these deeds was the brilliant and faithful work of those few survivors of the famous squadron who directed the activities in the air of the no less ardent youth who followed them to France in high resolve.

The function of the air service is four-fold. It has first to direct artillery fire and to reconnoiter and report during an attack; second, to do long-distance reconnaissance and to obtain photographs of the enemy positions; third, to bomb both by day and by night; and fourth, to keep the enemy over his own lines and away from ours. For the first three kinds of work two-seated machines, manned by pilot and observer, are used. The fourth type of work is performed by light, fast, amazingly maneuverable, single-seated machines. The work of the latter class is essentially offensive, mounting as they do two fixed guns in front timed to fire between the revolving blades of the propeller. This class of planes is called "Pursuit"—or "Chasse," as the French term it.

Our first squadrons appeared, as did our first infantry units, on the old Toul-Luneville sector, the squadrons first to get into the fray being the 1st and 12th artillery observation, photographic and reconnaissance squadrons, the 1st "pursuit" group, containing the 94th, 95th, 147th, and 27th squadrons, and the 96th, our first day-bombardment squadron. We had no night squadrons until just before the signing of the armistice. Besides these squadrons on the Toul sector we had the 103d pursuit squadron, under Major Thaw, at Dunkirk. As time went on many other squadrons came to the front and made enviable records, but these first bore the brunt of it when conditions were most difficult.

There was great difficulty at first in establishing liaison between the air force and the forces on the ground, but this was gradually smoothed away with time and experience. Our photographic work from the first was of a high order, and it is safe to say that at Toul we were masters of the air.

At Château-Thierry the enemy had absolutely everything he could muster, and the Americans, though reinforced by a brigade of British and some French squadrons, were greatly outnumbered. Here our casualties were very heavy, especially in the pursuit squadrons. The 94th and 95th squadrons, who had performed so brilliantly at Toul, were changing their Nieuport machines to Spads, and a heavy burden fell on the shoulders of the 27th and the 147th. Here the 27th, under the leadership of Colonel (then Major) Hartney, D.S.C., formerly of the Royal Flying Corps, did exceptionally fine work, though with heavy losses. Colonel Hartney later commanded the First Pursuit Group, and much of the success of that organization, to whose credit fell two-thirds of our official victories in the air, was due to his inspiring leadership.

After Château-Thierry came the St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne offensives, fundamentally different from the earlier days in that the allied armies were attacking. Reinforced now by many new squadrons, we gained and held the supremacy of the air on these fronts, successfully performing our aerial missions and bringing down many more of the enemy planes than they did of ours. Only the bombers continued to suffer heavy casualties, due in part to the very nature of their work; but also, it must be confessed, to inefficient direction and to the fact that the Liberty motors, exceedingly efficient in themselves, were installed in a plane that was at least a year out of date and quite unadapted to the work required of it.

Mention should be made of our squadrons with the British, several of which did excellent work, and also four naval squadrons and their less spectacular but very important patrol work. Some individuals, too, distinguished themselves on the Italian Front. Everywhere our pilots, in most cases with a very limited amount of training, brought credit to themselves and to their country by their courage, their audacity, and their hard, conscientious work.

Captain Rickenbacker, with his twenty-six official victories, and Lieutenant Luke, whose meteoric career earned the only Congressional Medal awarded an aviator, were the outstanding heroes of our air forces, but all who flew over the lines did so with the same calm, determined effort to "do their bit" that distinguished every American unit on the front in every branch of the service.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE DOUGHBOY IN THE FIGHTING-LINE

Lauress J. Birney

[Bishop Lauress J. Birney was Dean of the School of Theology of Boston University.]

HAVING been asked to record impressions, as received at the front, of the spirit and temper of the American soldier in action, the writer complies, with the hope that it may help, if ever so little, to visualize to some who were not privileged to be with him, the most remarkable soldier in the great World War. In what may here be written there is no idealization of the doughboy. The writer saw, and keeps clearly in mind, all the sordid side of war. It was mingled everywhere with the sublimity of spirit. Pages could be written of it. Even yet the memory of the unspeakable profanity is nauseating. A whole dictionary might be compiled of the profane terms which the writer never knew existed until he lived with the troops day and night. Nevertheless it is the universal testimony of those officials who moved through all the armies that the cleanest-tongued soldier in the great war was the doughboy from America.

Literally hundreds of thousands of them never used a profane or unclean word.

Nor do we forget the French wine and its effect upon many of our lads. That it is non-intoxicating and harmless is a vicious delusion. Scores we have seen under its influence, some of them idiotically drunk. But by the testimony of the same observers on every hand, the most temperate soldier in the war was without any question our own American doughboy. No one who has studied the facts ever doubts that there was less of drunkenness among the two million soldiers in France, so far from home, than there would have been among the same two million had they remained on this side of the sea.

The same is true of their moral life. There are doubtless many bad French women, but he who believes the womanhood of France to be a degenerate womanhood simply betrays his blind acceptance of a German propaganda which has been in process for a generation, to prepare the mind of the world for "the day" which brought the sprawling defeat of its brutal prophets and the supreme victory of the "degenerate race." No race of degenerate womanhood can ever give birth to such amazing soldiers as made up the army of France. If the laws in this land were as lax and free as they are in France,— thank God they are not, and pray heaven they may never be,— if they were, one would see any night on the streets of any great American city what may be seen on the streets of Paris. Thousands of our soldiers fell to this temptation, but the American Army was by all odds the cleanest army that fought for the liberty of the world. Such a record has probably never been equaled by any army in the world's history. There was much less of this form of immorality among the two million men than there would have been among the same men had there never been a war. But we turn eagerly to the rare and unforgettable elements in this doughboy's character as revealed under the test of fire and mud and blood.

The first and most conspicuous of these elements were his heroism, courage, abandon, on the field of battle. Not braver than the soldier of other armies, yet all who saw him in action instantly recognized a mystic difference between his daring and that of other soldiers. Among the reasons for that difference was the poignant realization as he entered the line that he was "mighty late in the game." By the time he reached the point where he went over the top he realized that the very ground he walked on was soaked with the blood of millions who had died for his safety while his country wrote harmless notes. And over the top he went, determined to make up for lost time if possible. Again he realized as no other soldiers did that the whole world was watching him with a terrible anxiety. Other armies had done their best, and the awful fear of their failure was never so heavy upon the heart of the world as at the time when he went into the line. He felt the world expectation and hope. He felt it keenly, and into the line he went determined to die to the last man rather than give an inch. He did just that. Yet again, the rare detachment from personal advantage went far to make the mystic difference in his courage. The poilu was fighting for desperate defense and sometimes for revenge. His home was, or might be, ruined and his loved ones desecrated. Likewise with the Tommy. "Three weeks to Paris, three months to London" was the boastful chant of the Hun as he swept across Belgium. The doughboy, too, was fighting for defense. It was in a very real sense the defense of America, too, but he could not realize it. It was too indefinite and far away. He was in that line for a square deal and a decent civilization. This, too, helped to make possible that strange but unmistakable difference in his amazing heroism. To use the phrase of Secretary Baker, who saw the boys in one action, "The American soldier literally romps in battle." It was a kind of intoxication of courage, yet wholly deliberate and fully conscious of the peril. Again and again have men walked out in the open to draw the fire of a hidden machine gun, that his pals might locate it, but knowing well that they would bury him in the soil of France. In a few minutes after one company of 250 went into action at Château-Thierry, 245 of them were down, but there was never a moment of wavering or hesitation. Only 200 of our men and 10 machine guns held the horde of Huns at the Château-Thierry bridges across the Marne for hours till reinforcements could come. Most of the 200 never came back. In desperation they fired not wildly, in the "direction of the enemy," but coolly calculating the distance, adjusting their sight accordingly, picking out one man and bringing him down. Then the next, often with some grim jest to the nearest pal. That young officer was absolutely typical who, when asked by a French officer at Château-Thierry to cover the French retreat until they could go back a kilometer and dig a trench into which the Americans could then retreat, replied, "The hell you say! We 've just come, and we did n't come to retreat!" And not an inch of ground did they yield. Hindenberg said when we entered the war, "The American soldier is a coward and won't fight; he has never been trained and can't fight, and they can never get him over here if he would and could fight." It was Hindenberg again who said, after Château-Thierry, "Mark me, from this time on the American soldier is our most dangerous enemy." This accurately expresses the conviction of every German soldier after he had come in contact with our boys, and especially if he had met the doughboy with the bayonet. Though they hated the work of the bayonet, our boys were usually eager to get into bayonet combat with the Hun because they knew themselves to be vastly superior to the Hun in hand-to-hand combat. One very seldom saw an American soldier dead or wounded by the bayonet, while death or wounds by the American bayonet were very common among the Germans, and they early came to feel the doughboy to be invincible. A letter was found on the dead body of a German soldier in the St. Mihiel drive, through which it was my privilege to go with the 90th Division, written by a pal from the Château-Thierry sector. In it was this paragraph giving the typical Hun fear of the doughboy: "If the American soldiers are down there, and if they come out of their trenches, you get out of yours or prepare to meet your God, that 's all, for they are like lightning; they come mighty quick, and nothing can stop them." Never again can it be said that the citizen soldier is inferior to the professional. It will always be remembered that his chivalry, self-forgetting sacrificial heroism, has never been surpassed.

But his bravery was matched by his amazing spirit in the fighting line. Back of the line in the training camps he "grouched" about everything. But in the fighting line he bore everything without complaint. The writer has seen many hundreds of men wounded, bleeding, gassed, but with one exception never heard an American soldier even moan. The one exception was at the little village of Vilcey, south of Metz, where, under violent shell fire, a soldier terribly wounded in the head, unconscious, dying in a few minutes, was quietly moaning, "My head, my head!" A physician at Château-Thierry and later battles, on whose operating table thousands had gone under the knife, said to the writer that with the exception of a few soldiers whom he had placed under ether, he had not heard a single doughboy either moan or groan all summer long. They looked out for "number one" back in the training camp, but up there they thought of each other first. There were of course exceptions to this, but the writer saw none nor heard of any in the actual fighting. The soldier whose legs were both shot off and who said commandingly, when they were lifting him to the ambulance, "Get out o' here; take those fellows who are really hurt," expressed the real spirit seen everywhere in the terrible line. Again and again have I felt as Moses must have felt when he removed his shoes on the holy ground. I have many times felt like baring my head in the presence of men who in the stress of peril acted so much like Christ, and never seemed conscious of it. Can anything ever be finer at such a time than the wounded lad who, when told that he must go West in a few minutes, quietly replied, "Oh, well, it does n't matter; my livin' would n't win this war anyway." Not his living or dying, but to win that war, was the thing that mattered. By the thousands they fought, suffered, and died in the same spirit.

It was likewise shown in their attitude toward the horrible inconvenience and privations while they were fighting. Boys who had never slept except between two clean sheets, and had eaten only the best of food, delicately served, there slept, lived, fought, in the indescribable French mud and chill and rain, went long without food and water, sometimes weeks without enough of the latter to wash or shave in, and never complained of it, but constantly joked about it.

And this suggests the third striking characteristic every one saw in the doughboy who saw him in action, namely, his unbelievable humor. No other characteristic so convinced the thoughtful observer quickly and fully that the doughboy was simply invincible than did his humor in the hour of peril and suffering. It took some time and thought to see the real meaning and significance of the jokes, rough and fine, that flew like shuttles in the warp and woof of destiny. Finally it began to dawn upon one. This is what it meant: "Play the game, play the game. No matter if you die, PLAY THE GAME!" And how they did play the game, bless their wonderful hearts! How they bucked each other up in the moments of peril, by their cheerful ribaldry and unfailing fun. Their silly war songs and parodies, flung like a gay defiance at death and the Hun, made the very desolation of ghastly walls of shattered homes and twisted stumps of once stately trees less somber and terrifying; made the mud and the cold less grim and cheerless; and made the cause of the savage in the opposite trenches seem what it really was from the moment our men went into the line — a lost cause and hopeless.

The New Yorker with both legs off, laughing as he said, "Won't I look dandy going down Fifth Avenue selling pencils!" The soldier in the front trench under a German box-barrage, shouting to his nearest neighbor ten feet away, who could of course hear not a word, but who, when the din was over, asked, "What in thunder were you saying?" replied, "Why, you bloomin' idiot, I had the hiccoughs and I wanted you to say something to frighten me!" The doughboy in the St. Mihiel drive who captured a German officer's horse, overcoat, and helmet, donned the two latter, mounted the horse, and rode back to meet the next wave of doughboys with his hands up yelling, "Kamerad! Kamerad!" The artillery lad who painted along the long barrel of the 16-inch gun, with its messages constantly going over our heads into Metz, the name of "Old Dutch Cleanser!"— these are but typical of the spirit of the American soldier in action. An army like that will never be whipped. They will die by the thousands, die with genial jest upon their lips, but they will never be conquered.

A fourth characteristic was the doughboy's fundamental and supporting faith in God and the future. About it he talked little, but any one who ever says that the American soldier in France was without religion betrays either his ignorance of the soldier, his own lack of religion, or an incapacity to recognize essential religious faith when he sees it. It was there, often under even a profane exterior. The big-boned Texan who came up with rifle and pack at the close of a quiet little communion service held during a brief lull, and said, with tears in his eyes, "That was a damn fine time," was uttering in his own way a great and comforting faith in a Christ who went also to the cross rather than fail of his duty. There were countless lads who could have written what one wrote home to his mother,— "Dear Mother, I believe, I have found my faith here. Every one finds his belief — his faith — here, and I have found mine." The entire space allotted me could be filled with evidences of the soldier's faith in God, out there in the line of death, however he may honor or dishonor that faith when he is back home in safety.

A fifth characteristic of the American lad in the atmosphere of the battle line was his idealism. The writer has for twenty years mingled sympathetically with the youth of his native land, and believes that in normal times of peace seventy-five in every hundred of them are essentially selfish, self-centered, simply looking into the future with the ambition for success—prosperity—in some trade or profession. Suddenly came a great call from humanity, and rang like a mighty challenge in the soul of American youth, calling into life every dormant altruistic capacity of which they were capable.

Never in all the scarlet past,
Since God first placed the suns;
Not since the Goths drank deep of blood
And women feared the Huns;
Not since the hordes of Attila
Spread their flame and shame,
Came a call so clear, for men to hear,
Who would fight in freedom's name.

And up they came from log hut and palace to answer the world call for help. The nearer they approached the fighting line, the nobler was their sacrificial idealism, until at the front it seemed that every man of them had laid his life upon the altar of humanity's great need. Countless thousands of them had never before experienced the luxury and joy of forgetting themselves and giving life for others. There they discovered it,—with surprise and joy they found it,— and again and again they have said to me in quiet moments, "If I should get back home, it does not seem to me I could ever settle down to do what I had planned to do — just make money."

Back out of the line and homeward the writer came with fear lest we should not be able as a people to meet and greet the returning doughboy with an idealism like that. If we cannot and do not, we are unworthy of him and what he did for us all.

As we crept up the misty, foggy harbor of New York, that October Sunday morning, three hundred wounded boys, legless, armless, with cots and bandages and crutches, were crowded out on the deck peering eagerly in every direction for a first glimpse of home. All at once she came, out of the mist and cloud, holding aloft her lighted torch, "Liberty Enlightening the World." It was one of the most beautiful, solemn moments ever given to a man to live. There were many moist eyes that had faced death with a look steady and undimmed. Standing in the midst of them I heard a wounded doughboy behind me talking to himself. This is what he said: "Now she can lower her arm a bit." He had helped her to do her world task. He had given some of his blood to help make her message good. He was standing in the midst of three hundred, every one of whom had given some of his blood to make her message good. To us all comes the deathless challenge,— to make her message good at home, in all the earth, or we shall be unworthy of the sacrifice of these wonderful lads.

LIEUTENANT J. HORACE FARNHAM

J. HORACE FARNHAM

LIEUTENANT J. HORACE FARNHAM, of the Canadian Royal Flying Corps, was killed in an aeroplane accident in England, April 25, 1918. Mr. Farnham enlisted in the Canadian Royal Flying Corps in August, 1917, and for a time was stationed at Toronto; later he was sent to Kelly Field, San Antonio, Tex., where he finished his training in aviation. He was then sent to England for intensive training, and specialization on war machines, at the R. F. C. camp at Yatesbury, Wiltshire. Mr. Farnham was at the time of his death a senior in the evening division of the College of Business Administration. He was one of the most popular men in college. The members of his class presented to the college a fine portrait of Mr. Farnham; this portrait has been placed on the walls of the college library.

VARIETIES OF WAR EXPERIENCE WITH THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION IN FRANCE

Samuel Dupertuis

[Rev. Samuel Dupertuis, a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a graduate of the University of Puget Sound, '14, received the degree of A.M. from Boston University in 1916.]

AMONG the many chapters to be written on the subject of the great war, none will be filled with more human interest and ennobling experiences than the recital of the services rendered by the Young Men's Christian Association and kindred organizations. The writer is not a professional Y. M. C. A. man— he is a clergyman and a college professor. It was his high privilege to spend fifteen months in war work in France. The experiences here related are not unique; they are rather typical of those of the thousands of men and women who were engaged in war work.

I went to France in September, 1917, and was first assigned to serve in Paris as interpreter. Then one day came an urgent call to the office to send a Y. M. C. A. man with equipment to a camp just set up some thirty-five miles north of Paris. I was chosen for that service. I found that the camp was the Base Camp of the United States Army Ambulance Service with the French Army.

The camp was situated in an abandoned farmhouse, the rooms being used for offices, the material being stored in the barn and stable. The men slept in their ambulances. It was late in October. The rains had set in and the red-clay mud was thick and sticky. The atmosphere was damp and chilly. The men worked all day in the rain and damp, ate their meals outside in the rain, and when night came crept into their ambulances with their clothes wet and their feet covered with mud. There was no room for them to sit in, no fire, no place in which to read or write or spend the evening. It was a gloomy life they were living until barracks could be built for them and roads made to keep them out of the mud.

A cheer went up among the men when they saw the "Y" man ride into the camp. Seeing the conditions, I immediately secured a tent and equipment — tables, chairs, stoves, etc. — from our Paris warehouse, and with the volunteer help of soldiers soon had the tent up and ready for opening.

Our grand opening was on Hallowe'en night. There were three hundred men in camp. A program was drawn up consisting of songs, readings, and speeches by the men. Everybody, including all the officers, was there. The commanding officer made a speech, the Y. M. C. A. man spoke from the standpoint of that organization, and amid general and enthusiastic rejoicing the tent was formally dedicated to the soldiers as their meeting-place, their comfort, their home. But after that came the surprise of the evening — for they had been warned that a surprise was in store for them. After the program there was uncovered, as if by magic, a spread that delighted their eyes. But it was not for their eyes only; there were coffee, biscuits, cheese, and apples, and row upon row of pumpkin pies. "The first I have tasted since I left home;" "Just like home;" "The kind mother used to make," were the comments heard on every hand.

Yes, it was to be a home for the men. If I were asked to give in one word the significance of the work of the Y. M. C. A. in France, I would reply, "Home." These young college men — for they were volunteers from American colleges — had no home in France; the "Y" tent was now to be their home. Up to this moment they had had no place for reading, writing, or social intercourse; now they were to come to the warm, comfortable, home-like tent to spend the evening or leisure hours. Here they had music, books, games, a canteen. Frequently we had an entertainment in the evening, consisting usually of musical concerts given by American or French artists sent by the Entertainment Bureau of the Y. M. C. A., in Paris. The "Y" man, being a teacher of French, organized classes in French for both men and officers, so that most of the several thousand men who passed through the camp on their way to the front obtained some elementary knowledge of French through that means. On Sundays we had a formal religious service at ten o'clock in the morning, as much like a church service in America as possible, and in the evening we frequently had a free-for-all, general "sing." The men were happy. The discipline was much improved. The officers were delighted. The men would say every day, "This is just like home. What would we do without the Y. M. C. A.?" During the whole winter the most popular place in the camp was the "Tent," where there was never a dull moment.

I think, however, that it can truthfully be said that the greatest factor in the work of the Y. M. C. A. was not its equipment, not the canteens, but the human factor, the personal touch, the "Y" man. He, after all, was the real center and often the source of all the manifold activities of his organization in the camp. He was there. Men came to him for information on a hundred subjects or for advice. They read him some of their letters; they asked him to write to their parents; they sometimes confided their love affairs to him; they came to him for religious advice. It was the personal touch, the kind word, the hearty handshakes, that not infrequently put a new heart into a discouraged and homesick man.

By-products are sometimes of greater importance than the direct product. There is a by-product of the work of the welfare organizations in France to which reference is not often made, but which is to me of very great significance. It is the imparting to the French people of many of our American ideals. I recall two striking incidents. When, in the fall of 1917, we were near to our annual Thanksgiving day, and were making extensive preparations for a celebration worthy of the occasion, the French civilians in the community asked me the meaning of this holiday. I told them that it is the custom for our President once a year to make a proclamation calling on the people everywhere to cease from their labors and give formal thanks, both in private and in public, to Almighty God for His benefits during the year. "It is one of your church holidays," they said. And when I replied that it was not a church but a national holiday, they exclaimed, "You are a very religious people. That explains your unique ideals and your greatness." I found after many conversations with people of every class, from unlearned peasants to persons of refinement and culture, that the whole American effort in the war, with its colossal proportions, its marvel of organization, its welfare work, its philanthropy, the good behavior and superb valor of our men, and our devotion to the great ideal of Liberty, is regarded as an expression of our religion as a people. Whether this conception is correct or not may be questioned by some, nevertheless it cannot help exerting a great moral influence upon those who interpret our effort in that light.

In the spring of 1918 we observed "Mother's Day" in our camp. In preparation for it I asked every man to secure a white flower to wear in honor of the day; and at an entertainment where there were many civilians I asked them if they would help us secure flowers for decorations. "Yes, gladly," they answered in a hearty chorus. When the day came we were almost buried under flowers,— potted flowers, palms, cut flowers, and flowers from garden and field, — all brought by civilians. At the suggestion of a soldier I had requested the Paris office to send us an American lady of middle age to be the guest of the camp for the day and to represent "Mother" to us all.

Sunday came. The program consisted of music and hymns, just as in the churches in America; an address on "Mother" by an officer, another by a soldier; a speech from the lady who was to come; and a few words from the "Y" man. The platform was arranged like a flower garden. The barrack (we had replaced the tent by a barrack) was crowded with soldiers and civilians. The men were all eagerly looking for the lady, the guest of the day. It is not difficult to imagine the tumultuous applause when I led to the platform, among the flowers, not one American lady of middle age, but two bright, modest "Y" girls—far below middle age.

The service was religious and impressive. One of the girls gave to the boys a talk that they will not soon forget. The girls were the guests of the officers for the noon mess, and of the men for the rest of the day. They spent the afternoon in the canteen, serving the men. They ate with the men at mess in the evening. There were two mess-halls, and one of the girls presided at mess in one hall and the other in the other. The "Y" man divided his meal between the two halls. Then came the evening. The barrack was arranged like a church parlor, with flowers upon stands in the middle of the floor, and the seats in a row around the wall. The girls sat in the flower garden on the platform. We then had a "sing," and how the men sang! For nearly two hours we sang hymns and popular songs and had several readings. Each of the girls gave a good, wholesome talk to the men, and then served them chocolate and cookies.

To close this memorable day I asked the girls to stand at the door as the men went out and shake hands with them, and thus every man in the camp had the opportunity of shaking hands with a real American girl — a rare treat then in France. The men were happy, and will never forget that day. They talked of it for weeks afterward. And the civilians! They thought it the most beautiful thing they had ever seen — that a day should be so religiously spent in honor of Mother. And so again they were impressed with another of our beautiful ideals. This day was spent in similar manner in hundreds of camps throughout France, and the total impress upon the people must have been great.

My next experience was a trip to the front. It was there, in company with another "Y" man, that I took supplies to our men right up to the lines, under shell fire, sometimes in full view of the Germans. I can truly say that the Y. M. C. A. was with the men at the front, sharing their hardships and dangers. On a trip of a hundred and fifty miles along the front I found the Y. M. C. A. everywhere, serving the men in tents with canteen, reading and writing material, entertainments, and religious services. It was everywhere an oasis in the desert to the men.

There is one week in my life I can never forget. I was then stationed in the headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. in Paris. Two days after the great offensive of the Germans on July 14, 1918, word came to us that volunteer workers were needed in the hospitals of the city, for the wounded were pouring in in large numbers. Leaving my desk I hastened to one of the largest hospitals. Soon I found myself, with many others, busy caring for the men as they were brought in. They were nearly all Americans. They came in ambulance loads — in whole trains of ambulances. They poured in by scores — by hundreds — daily. A large percentage of them were stretcher cases. We would unload them from the ambulances and lay them down in rows upon the floor of the large receiving ward. A doctor would ascertain the nature of their wounds — they had all received first-aid treatment. Then we would remove their clothing, often cutting it off with scissors, piece by piece. After putting night clothes on them we carried them to the bath-room and then to the operating room. There were five operating rooms, with four and five tables in each. Operations went on day and night without ceasing in all the rooms for one week. About four thousand men were cared for during that week. They were wounded in every conceivable way and place, with shrapnel or machine gun, rifle bullet or gas. Some were only slightly wounded, some seriously, others fatally. What impressed me most was not their wounds nor their sufferings, but their wonderful patience. To see men, suffering from serious wounds, lie for many hours on a hard stretcher waiting for their turn on the operating table, and that without a murmur, was ennobling. With what utter devotion we worked with them! We almost forgot that we ever got tired. We worked day and night without time for sleep or rest. I worked most of the time with a doctor who had five hours' sleep in five days. I had but little more. We did not mind it. We were happy to do what we could. The men were always glad to see a Y. M. C. A. man around them. Many would tell us their experiences.

Not a few men died each day. I remember one Saturday morning, just at daybreak, after I had carried stretchers all night long, I was carrying men from the operating room to their beds, when a nurse said to me, "Take this man quickly to his bed and give this note to the nurse." With another man I carried him to a bed. The nurse administered some powerful stimulant and said to me, "This man cannot last long. I am too busy to stay with him. We must not let him die alone. Won't you stay with him?" I did, of course. He was a fine looking young man of about twenty-six years. He lay there unconscious, gasping for breath. I stayed all alone with him for about twenty minutes, when without a struggle he ceased breathing and paid the great price for human liberty. As I sat there by his side I tried in my sympathy to take the place of his loved ones, and as my tears fell my heart went out to them in sorrow. I took his address, and after many months finally found where his mother lived. I wrote to her and told her how a Y. M. C. A. man watched by her son until the last, taking her place as best he could. Her letter of gratitude to me is a treasure I shall forever keep.

At this writing I am in a Foyer du Soldat, the French Y. M. C. A. We serve men chocolate from the canteen and many articles from the bazar. We have entertainments several nights each week, about 800 men filling the room each night. I teach a class in English. It is inspiring to see these young French "poilus" earnestly trying to learn English. One night recently I gave a talk on America. The room was crowded. Again and again the men cheered as I told them of our ideals and our attitude toward the French nation. They cheer when I step upon the platform. They cheer when I step down into the audience. They gather around me in groups and ask questions. They say to me, "We want our country to possess those great ideals which are yours."

Among the many results achieved by the Y. M. C. A. in France not the least will be the interpretation of our American ideals to the French people.

HARRY WEBB FARRINGTON

HARRY WEBB FARRINGTON, Theology '10, saw service overseas and returned with the title of Honorary Cuirassier of the First Class of the French Army. This entitled him to wear the French uniform and to membership in one of the oldest and most distinguished cavalry regiments in France. Mr. Farrington received this high honor in recognition of his services in installing the Y. M. C. A. Foyers du Soldat in the French Army.

He sailed for France March 1, 1918. On his arrival he was assigned to work among the French soldiers. He began in Vancia among the automobile drivers and wounded men behind the lines; his work in organizing and stimulating athletics among the men soon attracted the attention of the French soldiers at Lyons, and he was asked to go there to the largest permanent camp in France.

Starting the work single handed he, in less than a year, built up a large organization with complete athletic fields, four huts, volley-ball, basket-ball, hockey, and other games. Mr. Farrington worked from the poilu up instead of from the officers down. The sight of an American playing games and toiling day and night in building athletic fields and handball courts, excited the wonder at first of the French officers. They soon became impressed with his whole-hearted devotion to the French soldiers, and joined cordially in coöperating with this representative of the Y. M. C. A. He was given two lieutenants, eight under officers, and hundreds of men to assist him. He was made official athletic instructor of the military camp. When he was about to return to America, he was given the honorary membership in the regiment and an official invitation to return and become head of the Foyers du Soldat in the French Army.

The order conferring the rank of Cuirassier on Mr. Farrington read as follows in the original:

"Se faisant l'interprète de tous les officiers, Grades & Cavaliers des dépôts des 7e et 10e Régiments de Cuirassiers, le Lieutenant-Colonel, Commandant les dépôts de Cuirassiers de Lyon, Nomme:

"Cuirassier de 1ère Classe, honoraire,

HARRY WEBB FARRINGTON, Syracuse & Harvard University (Amérique), en reconnaissance de tous les services qu'il a rendus aux Cuirassiers de la Part-Dieu, de son dévouement inlassable dans l'organisation des jeux athlétiques, et en particulier dans la fondation du "Foyer du Soldat" qui a augmenté dans de grandes proportions le bien-être des Cavaliers du Quartier."

HARRY WEBB FARRINGTON

Mr. Farrington has embodied his thrilling experiences in France in a collection of poems. One of these, "France Calls to Me," is especially well known both at home and in France. We herewith give in full another of his poems, entitled "The Face of France."

The Face of France

Yesterday
Our France was fair,
Like a gracious girl
With a joyous air;
Yesterday
A smile was there,
With laughing eyes
And wind-tossed hair.
For her waving locks and soft, light hair,
Were the trees and the grain in the summer air;
And her deep, red cheeks and laughing eyes,
Were the sun-kissed clouds of the bright, blue skies.
Yesterday
Our France was fair;
Her face was free
From the lines of care.

2

But to-day
Our France is marred,
Like a widowed girl
From her mate debarred;
Ah, to-day
Her face is scarred
With hollowed cheeks
And wrinkles hard,
For her hollowed cheeks and sunken eyes
Are the deep shell-holes, where her glory lies;
And the hard, drawn lines on her once smooth brow,
Are the furrowed fields of the trenches now.
And to-day
Our France is marred;
Her face from the gaze
Of the world is barred.

To-morrow
Our France is strong,
Like a girl mature
Who has conquered wrong;
To-morrow
She sings a song,
In tune with the sound
Of the Builder's throng.
For the serious song from her finer face
Is the sound of restoring her ravished place;
And her chastened color, and deeper eyes,
Are the features seen where a New France lies.
To-morrow
Our France is strong,
Mature, noble woman
Who conquered wrong.

THE FOYER DU SOLDAT

Harry Webb Farrington

[Harry Webb Farrington is a graduate of Syracuse University, '07, and of the School of Theology of Boston University, '10. He worked among the French soldiers as a Y. M. C. A. secretary. For his services he was awarded the unique distinction of Brevet de Cuirassiers de 1ère Classe Honoraire in the French Army.]

THE morning war was declared a telegram offering my services as a chaplain was sent to Washington; unfortunately it was received by a personal friend, who advised me to stay at my particular task, as there were plenty of men less needed at home.

However, some time later there came to my ears from an Italian street organ the strains of the "Marseillaise." Before it ended new sounds and visions came to me — the murmur of pupils and teachers in underground schools, young widows and old women sitting on débris and staring into space, the moaning wind, coursing through broken church towers, and the groans of wounded soldiers. And when I arose and came to myself I was in Hotel Astor in Bordeaux.

En route to Paris every glance out of the car window was a "Millet" or a "Corot." No wonder they said, "They shall not pass."

At Orleans I heard the "Maid" passing on the voices that had spoken to her. They were louder and more definite in the capital when "Dri" Davis, a Syracuse classmate, told of France's sufferings, heroisms, and needs.

Paris, with its air raids and the long guns, was a tragic drama. While waiting to get into the French Army, it was impossible not to write poetry. After some temporary service with the American troops in the Marne and in speaking to troops, consternation seized me at being sent to Fort du Vancia, near Lyons, instead of to Soissons, on the front.

I. Vancia.

A poet's paradise. Real work began about 4.30 p.m., but being the only American within a radius of ten miles, the initials on my collar spelled out, "Your Motto Christian American." Four words tell the story.

1. Perils. Being out of range of guns and planes, I experienced the perils of loafing, lures of the near-by city, brooding over one's own troubles and difficulties with French colleagues, mere routine of giving boys football to kick around in their own way, and counting up dirty paper money at night. This would not back up Pershing's reasons for suggesting to Pétain, "a 'Y' man and program in every regiment." The job was to get as near the war-winning game as possible, and not to do literary work, see the country, or secure political capital. We were to add something new to the French Army.

2. Personnel. I was blessed with a good colleague, Mr. Doste, an Alsatian Roman Catholic. Our harmony came from keeping our minds on the poilu and his needs. "You have the rubbish of the French Army," I was told. It was untrue, although they were what might be called the slow-pokes, clodhoppers, and good-for-nothing-elsers. They included young and old wounded men, also "auxiliaires," fitted for little else than to run autos. Our job was to make the younger ones more alert and keep up the morale of all.

3. Program. I soon saw that, left alone, the war-weary poilus were contented to drink chocolate, write letters, look at blurred films, and, if very active, kick the soccer ball a little. Aside from "jeux de boules," there was no recreation. We started with the game of "horse-shoes," first as a solitaire, then with a few observers. In my play I showed such enthusiasm that they first thought it the American national game. So sincerely did they appreciate and enter into this game that one night at 9 o'clock, I was on my knees with them measuring, by the little lighters (briquettes), the shoe nearest the peg. My impatient cook was calling me to count up the money. "Tranquille," I replied; "this is more important."

Then followed two courts for volley ball, young against the old, until they used to deceive me as to time, in order to play longer. Three jeux de boules courts were constructed, a fine croquet ground, an open theater, and finally a real baseball diamond. Permission from the engineers being wanting to cut down the trees, one of the men was changed into a most intelligent mole: phantom Boche planes nightly passed, and between their deadly aim and his intuition the trees disappeared and nobody was unhappy.

True, no expert players were developed, but they went away with the principles and the enthusiasm. I did not have to greet them first, when the day's work began at 7 a.m. instead of 4.30 p.m. The result was that on a visit of Major General Hibiki of the Japanese Army, who spoke to a crowded hutful of men who remained indoors after he left, he found outdoors seven different forms of physical recreation. The gratifying thing was that nothing was staged, and that the men would have been there regardless of his visit. No game ceased with his inspection of something else.

When the first companies of the volunteer Siamese Army to France were assigned to come to Vancia for training, it was the Red Triangle program prepared for them that saved their morale and demonstrated to the French officers the fundamental philosophy and absolute indispensability of the "Y."

4. Products. At Fort Sermenas, a mile away, a place discovered while we were seeking a short cut to the tramway, some library facilities and recreation were installed, greatly to the appreciation of the officers and every man, many of whom had visited Vancia.

Fort Sathony, two miles away, was the famous home of 4,000 Zouaves. My most alert boys, sent over there, would revisit me and say: "Ils ont beaucoup de terrain pour jouer là, mais pas d'équipement ou de direction." Our officers intermingled. Finally I was invited to visit the officers there. The most impressive experience was in finding one of my boys in company with a young wounded aviator, the light-weight boxing champion of France.

The commandant went to Paris to urge the Foyer du Soldat to do something. It was hard to resist the lure of the fine athletic field and the alert Zouaves, but there was a more needy call from elsewhere.

II. Part Dieu

Ten miles into Lyons, in the heart of this great and ancient city, is the largest walled-in caserne of France,—"La Part Dieu,"—the home, drill grounds, and training school of cuirassier, artillery, train, and automobile, with seven to ten thousand men going and coming all the time. Some officers from there had visited us and urged us to try to do something for them. Their invitation was referred to headquarters, with the final result that I was allowed to go there.

The proposition at Part Dieu involved some new policies on the part of the Foyer du Soldat, Y. M. C. A., or Union Franco Américaine, since it was the first venture into a permanent caserne or military establishment. I was willing to go there, first because of the distressing need. There was nothing for these men except dark, dingy wine cafés or canteens. There was one football there, but it was no good. Then I saw there was an opportunity to make a permanent demonstration of a French Army Y. M. C. A., impossible in the fighting area. Past experience prepared me for this new work, a work of which, as I learned before leaving, one of the colonels said, "He will never arrive."

1. I began from the bottom up, by winning at once the respect, confidence, and friendship of the secretary to the adjutant of the commandant.

2. Instead of impressing ideas, an example was set by working just as long and hard as my humblest poilu in the enterprises undertaken.

3. In place of autocratic domineering, responsibility and position were put upon others, wherever possible. Mediocre work by them was given the preference over excellent work by myself.

4. I learned that what the French undertook was done thoroughly and artistically.

Athletics. With the resources at hand and the solicited cooperation of as many parts of the service as possible, one of the most practical and beautiful double volley-ball courts in France was constructed. The first demonstration, at 8 o'clock one morning, by the white-duck clad artillery lads, witnessed by the leading officers, was beyond all expectations. This was followed by two other courts; two fine stone-line boundary basket-ball courts; three jeux de boules alleys; and finally, after great labor, which involved many weeks and the transportation from a great distance of thousands of cubic feet of cinders, one playground and one regular baseball diamond. As many as twelve games were in operation simultaneously. In addition to raising the morale and alertness of the men, and aside from the voluntary participation of the men whenever free to play, the work became a required part of the military program.

Physical Education. The officers were quick to see the strategic and military value of the free-movement, out-of-doors American games. As a result, the physical education of all the young soldiers was put into my hands. I was given a staff of ten grade and under-officers, and beginnings were made to correlate the formalistic exercises of the French Army with distinctive American games. As a by-product, interest was aroused in the boys' schools, and the early morning of July 4 witnessed the introduction of baseball to the boys of the famous Lycée Ampère in Parc Tête d'Or.

Apparatus was installed and baseball and volley-ball were started at Loyasse, in the "Central Regionale Instruction Physique," one of the eight military training schools of France.

Foyers. My theory gained from the experience of the Association in America was opposed to that of some of the French Foyer du Soldat leaders, who believed that soldiers would not be content to stay in a "prison-like" caserne, even if the "real things were going on inside." I therefore saw that to establish an Army Y. M. C. A. for, by, and with the army it would be necessary for me to "stoop to conquer."

At the outset of the work I had my credentials from Mr. D. A. Davis, the American director, and left Paris for Part Dieu with the seconding of the full program of work by Mr. Wm. S. Coffin, the other American director, and with his permission took, in the baggage car, four giant baskets of equipment for the huts. For several months these baskets rested untouched. Then, while the leaders in Paris were debating the possibility of such a work, I loaned myself five hundred francs, borrowed five hundred from the secretary to our American regional director, and on one of the "up days," with a slender thread of permission from the director, I "dug in," so that when the leaders came to consider and inspect there was too much going on, and it was rooted too deeply in the hearts of the soldiers and officers, to be disturbed.

Four foyers of varying sizes had been established in the great barracks, and twenty-five soldiers, from privates to sous-officiers, were employed and paid modestly out of the necessary profits of the canteens. A French colleague and an American assistant were sent. I was virtually made an athletic officer in the French Army, and so greatly was our American effort appreciated that, before leaving, the governor-general attended, and celebrated artists of the Grand Theater assisted at a monster concert.

Part Dieu being the only gasoline station between Marseilles and Dijon or Metz, we were, with the establishment of our foyers, able to give aid and comfort to thousands of American boys in the convoys.

We had at least laid such foundations that when I left for America, Mr. Frank C. Hazen, a wealthy and well-known New Yorker, left his wonderful work at quai de Retz to take charge of the foyers. In addition, two men were secured for the athletics and a professor for the English and Americanization work.

For the first time in my life I found myself tired and worn, but that was forgotten in the warm and tender appreciation. In spite of my progress in French, it was only when my lips touched the rough cheeks of some of my old poilus that I could make them feel my real affection; and when Colonel Schweiger embraced me with a kiss, I knew it was deeper than a mere formality.

In a way I was glad that public religious activities on the part of the Americans were prohibited in the French Army, for in a thousand ways my actions could better exemplify the Jesus who went about doing good.

The French people, when they realized the presence of the American soldiers, could not interpret it except in the terms of idealism and the actions of a religion of democracy; and when they felt the service of the men and women without weapons, who fought for their morale and personal welfare, they saw a Christ stepping out of the paintings and pulpits, the lofts and the lecterns, and moving among them as one who ministers.

Because so much of my work was constructive, in fifteen hundred other places it was deeper and more thorough. It was but an imperfect miniature of a part of the deeper impact of America upon France.

BASE HOSPITAL FORTY-FOUR

Wesley T. Lee

[Dr. Wesley T. Lee is Professor of Diseases of the Skin in the School of Medicine of Boston University.]

SHORTLY after the United States Government declared war upon the Imperial German Empire, a meeting of the staff of the Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital was held, at which it was unanimously voted that an offer be made to the American Red Cross to organize a base hospital in connection with this institution. The authorization for the formation of Base Hospital Forty-four was shortly forthcoming, and an intensive ten-day financial campaign resulted in a large oversubscription of the $30,000 required for the purchase of its equipment. In response to an appeal to the members of the profession associated with the hospital, about seventy physicians offered their services, and thirty-two were selected to serve on the staff of the Base Hospital. Of this number, the following men were members of the Faculty of Boston University School of Medicine: Drs. David L. Belding, Orville R. Chadwell, Thomas E. Chandler, Sanford B. Hooker, Wesley T. Lee, Howard Moore, J. Arnold Rockwell, William K. S. Thomas, and William F. Wesselhœft. In addition to these members of the Faculty, the following graduates of the school were chosen: Drs. Kirke L. Alexander, Milo C. Green, John W. Harvey, John A. Hayward, Ralph H. Hopkins, Harold L. Leland, Harry F. Morin, Roland O. Parris, Harold L. Ripley, Warren S. Shields, and Ralph C. Wiggin.

Dr. Wesselhœft was appointed Director of the Base Hospital, and Mrs. Alice H. Flash, Superintendent of Nurses at the Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, was selected as Chief Nurse. One hundred nurses were enrolled, and an enlisted personnel of two hundred was chosen from nearly two thousand applicants.

During the summer the task of organizing and equipping the Unit progressed rapidly. The officers received their commissions; physical examinations, vaccinations, and inoculations were done; many of the enlisted men received training in the hospital wards; and the tremendous undertaking of purchasing the vast amount of necessary supplies was carried forward. Every effort was made to complete the work as quickly as possible, for it was supposed that the Unit would be called into active service early in the fall; but the weeks slipped by, and nothing more substantial developed than innumerable rumors concerning the future movements of the hospital. Opportunity was given to develop and perfect plans for the activities of the organization; to select apparatus which would be especially useful in the work of the members of the staff; and for the special training of many of the officers in the military schools, camps, and hospitals. Twenty of the nurses volunteered for temporary service, and were assigned for duty in some of the cantonments.

The long deferred and anxiously awaited action of the War Department came late in February, 1918, and the mobilization of the Enlisted Personnel occurred at the Out Patient Department of the Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital on Sunday, March 10. Lunch was served, and an inspiring address was delivered by the director. Mr. Ezra H. Baker, President of the Board of Trustees, extended his felicitations and good wishes in behalf of the institution. The Command proceeded in special trolley cars to the armory in Charlestown, where the task of outfitting the men was at once begun. The garments of civilian life were discarded, and these boys became soldiers from their skins out. The following day was spent in adjustments of seemingly impossible combinations and conditions of equipment, and in the evening the detachment entrained and proceeded to Camp Dix, New Jersey.

During the next three weeks the men were subjected to a course of intensive military training, and their development as soldiers was rapid and inspiring. They entered their new life with a determination to "make good," and the morale of the organization was at the maximum. On April 1 the Command was transferred to the Camp Dix Base Hospital, and the men were assigned to the various departments of the institution for training. Orders for the mobilization of the Commissioned Personnel and Nurse Corps were received early in April. The medical officers reported for duty at Camp Dix, while the nurses were divided into detachments and stationed in fourteen cantonments for temporary duty. By the middle of April the mobilization of Base Hospital Forty-four was practically completed.

The experiences gained during these weeks of training were very valuable, and were conducive to the success of the work done by the Unit overseas. The Commanding Officer, Lieut.-Col. Robert H. Wilds, arrived, and on April 19 word was received that the Unit would sail on May 1. A period of intense activity was inaugurated, and frantic efforts were made to complete the equipment and prepare the endless collections of data which were required. On Sunday, April 22, the fond parents, distressed wives, tearful sweethearts, and admiring relatives and friends of the brave soldier boys flocked into camp by train and automobile, and the adieus were said and done. The fateful day arrived — and nothing happened. Other days came and went, and still no orders were forthcoming. Rumors there were aplenty, but the "Powers that be" preserved a sphinx-like silence. Gradually the tension relaxed, work details were resumed, and the men settled down to a prolonged period of watchful waiting. It was not until July 2 that the overseas orders were received.

On the morning of July 5 the Unit proceeded to Hoboken, and the transport was boarded late in the afternoon. During the night troops continued to embark, and before morning the boat was completely filled with men and freight. The convoy, consisting of fifteen transports and a battle cruiser, left New York on the sixth.

The voyage was replete with interesting happenings and conditions. The men were not allowed to separate themselves from their life-preservers during the entire passage; daily boat drills were held; not a ray of light was permitted to escape from the vessel at night; target practice by the gunners, the zigzagging evolutions of the ships, and the frequent signalings were sources of interest; submarine scares were daily occurrences, and the vessel fairly seethed with rumors; physical inspections, music, and letter-writing helped to pass the time. There were many varieties of weather, but the atmospheric conditions were generally favorable and the sea comparatively smooth. Many were afflicted with "mal-de-mer," and some even "cursed the day they were born." During the night of July 15 eight destroyers met the convoy, and early in the morning of the seventeenth the rugged coast of "Bonny Scotland" was clearly seen in the distance. Land was visible during the entire day as the fleet proceeded southward, and mine-sweepers, destroyers, aeroplanes, and a dirigible acted as guardians. Late in the afternoon the convoy approached Liverpool, and on a multitude of crafts and all along the shores the crowds cheered and waved; bells rang, whistles blew, and every evidence of a hearty welcome was given. The transport came to anchor in the evening, and the songs and cheers of the men on board mingled with the acclaims of those on all sides.

The Unit disembarked the following morning, and late in the afternoon entrained and started on the next stage of its journey. The fine gardens, green fields, rolling hills, and peaceful villages looked good to the travel-worn men who had been twelve days on the ocean. Southampton was reached on the morning of the nineteenth, and four days were spent at a "Rest Camp" in this place. The skies wept almost continuously, the mess was miserable, the accommodations were uncomfortable, and — well, everything. The men were glad when the order to proceed arrived on the twenty-second, and in company with other detachments they crowded the Channel steamer Viper to its utmost capacity. Nobody will forget the trip across the Channel; the furious speed of the steamer and the awful lurches as the course was suddenly changed; the tempest of wind and rain; the impenetrable darkness; the flashing signals of the destroyers; and the groans and agonized exertions of the sick. Le Havre was reached early the next morning. On the following day the Unit proceeded by rail, and early in the morning of July 26, the train came to a jerky stop at the little station of Pougues-les-Eaux. The protracted period of preparation and transportation was ended, and Forty-four was about to "do its bit."

Pougues-les-Eaux is a small town situated near the geographical center of France. It is two miles from the Loire River, and is surrounded by a charmingly picturesque rolling country chiefly occupied by farms and vineyards. The town is famous for its mineral springs, of which the St. Leger is the most renowned, and during the summer season has been for many years a popular resort for people desiring to "take the cure." With the advent of the United States into the war, arrangements were made to lease about twenty buildings to the Government for use as a hospital for the care of American soldiers. These buildings varied in size, from capacities of thirty-five to three hundred, with several not suitable for patients; in age, from a comparatively recent time to an ancient period; and in condition, from a fairly well built and well preserved building, to a time-worn and neglected structure. The gigantic task of preparing these buildings for hospital purposes was presented to Forty-four, and the men went to work with a will. Beds were set up in all available places; furniture was placed; carpenters, electricians, plumbers, and painters ripped, tore, scraped, altered, and rebuilt the interiors of buildings; while details of soldiers and civilian employees scrubbed and cleaned.

The French people were very cordial, and many of the members of the Unit soon formed pleasant friendships. Quite a proportion of the men began an intensive study of the language, assisted by volunteer and professional teachers, and aided and abetted by the townspeople.

The Red Cross representative arrived shortly, and immediately formulated plans for the entertainment and comfort of the men of the Unit and of the prospective patients. On August 4, the nurses reached Pougues. The Nurse Corps had been mobilized in New York, and had sailed for France on July 14. After a prolonged trip they arrived in Paris, where twenty-four of their number were detached for special duty. After their arrival in Pougues, the remainder were divided into two groups for duty in large hospital centers near by. One of these groups subsequently returned to Forty-four and remained during the period of activity of the hospital.

The first patients were received on August 10, and consisted of one hundred and fifty-nine convalescent soldiers from the Mesves hospital center. These men were practically all ambulatory, and their chief cry was, "When do we eat?" Daily accessions of patients by train and truck soon taxed the capacity of the hospital to its limit, and everybody was working to the utmost of his ability. Early in October the epidemic of influenza swept over France, and about a third of the officers, nurses, and enlisted men were "hors-de-combat." Those were trying times for Forty-four, and the strength and courage of the members of the Unit were tested to their maximum endurance. Two surgical teams were sent to the front for a period of six weeks, and several of the officers were temporarily detached for service in other places.

The machinery of the organization was running smoothly, and everybody had settled down for a "long pull," when, on November 11, the ringing of bells, the shrieking of whistles, the displaying of flags, and the shouts of the people proclaimed the signing of the armistice. The stream of patients entering the hospital ceased to flow and the work quickly decreased in amount. Early in December the last of the patients were transferred, and the real work of Forty-four was completed. About thirty-seven hundred patients had been treated and two hundred surgical operations performed. Thirty-three had died.

On December 15, the Unit was moved to the Mesves hospital center. The rain descended profusely and persistently; roofs leaked; the awful mud necessitated the constant wearing of hip boots; drinking-water was scarce and poor; there was no electricity; and there was a penetrating chill in the air. But "ça ne fait rien," and everybody was cheerful; the men were Homeward Bound! Everything seemed to be in readiness for the word which should start the Unit on its journey, and orders were expected daily; but Forty-four was doomed to another heart-breaking period in its history. Day after day passed with no message from the "Great Unknown." Discouraging rumors began to circulate, and several of the officers and enlisted men were transferred to other parts of the A. E. F. for duty. It looked as though the Unit was to be completely broken up and the members retained indefinitely in France. The morale of the organization utterly succumbed, and the only redeeming feature of this period of profound depression was that opportunities were given to most of the men to visit Paris, the battlegrounds, and the leave areas in eastern and southern France.

Orders to move finally arrived, and on March 20 the Unit left Mesves, reaching Brest on the twenty-second. Two weeks were spent here at Camp Pontanezen. On April 6 the Command boarded the Graf Waldersee, and as the men watched the receding shores of "Sunny France" their minds were full of thankfulness that their period of enforced tenancy of this war-worn section of the earth had ended, and that they were on the last lap of the long journey to their own country, "God's Country."

The voyage to America was uneventful, and on Easter Sunday morning, April 20, the Statue of Liberty loomed in the distance. Cheer upon cheer rose from the soldiers on the ship, and these were answered by the welcoming shouts of those who had come down the harbor to greet the returning troops. Camp Merritt was reached in the afternoon, and after a sojourn of five days, the Unit proceeded to Camp Devens, where the final paper work was completed and the men mustered out on May 2.

Thus ended the official existence of Base Hospital Forty-four. Through sunshine and shadow, pleasures and hardships, dangers and discouragements, hopes and fears, the men had lived and worked in the closest intimacy. Enduring friendships had been formed, unchangeable records of good and bad — mostly good — had been completed; characters had been moulded; indelible impressions of men and methods had been registered; five had made the supreme sacrifice. Through all the feelings of joy and thankfulness that the end had come, the anticipations of the future, and the satisfaction of realizing that the duty had been well performed, there ran a sensation of regret that these associations were ended, and that there never again would be a complete assemblage of those who had comprised the personnel of United States Army Base Hospital Forty-four.

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS

Mary Katharine Taylor

[Miss Mary Katharine Taylor is a graduate of the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University, '10. She served in the Red Cross as Casualty Searcher and Home Service representative at Base Hospital 31, Contrexéville, France. In February, 1919, she was transferred to Evacuation Hospital Number 9, Coblenz, Germany. Returning to this country in the summer of 1919, she was assigned to Red Cross work at Camp Devens, Ayer, Mass.]

"Sincerely yours, Mary K. Taylor, Home Communication Service, American Red Cross."

AS I write these words there lies before me a folder containing carbons of about two hundred letters signed "Sincerely yours, Mary K. Taylor, American Red Cross," and four worn notebooks full of strange little scribbles. I turn at random to a page and read:

"Bed 31, Ward E-2, wants razor blades."

"New man in end bed, surgical 3, wants letter written. Urgent."

"Ask Red Cross Captain whether to give writing-paper to wounded Germans."

"Nurse in pneumonia ward wants Blackjack gum."

"Tell Major Black New Orleans Red Cross has just cabled that his wife is dead."

"Y. M. C. A. man in officers' ward wants long distance call sent to Colombey to find out whether doctor at Field Hospital knows where his trousers are."

"John McCarthy's last words: 'Tell mother the weather is fine, and I will be home soon.' "

And so they go — each hasty little note a story in itself.

As I glance them over I see again the wards of Base Hospital 31, and recall the thrilling days of the Argonne drive. One surgical ward comes especially to my mind, where the boys lay day after day, their arms or legs suspended in splints, and the air blue with the smoke of Piedmonts (no "Camels" to be had!) that they smoked through the weary hours. And I hear again the cheerful yell, "Hey, Red Cross, roll me a cigarette?" greeted with mirth by the veterans who were present the day I tried to roll a cigarette for a boy who had both arms in splints. What happened? Well — try it, ladies. And when you get it carefully rolled, even if it is a little bit humpy, dodge the ropes of the hanging splints and lean very gently over the man so that he can "lick" it himself. And then let your hand shake a little bit from excitement and amusement, and something else (for you have just noticed that there is a screen around the corner bed, and you know that the plucky little seventeen-year-old with the amputated leg is going West). Try it, I say, and you will know why Surgical 3 laughed.

And I can feel again the hush of the pneumonia ward, where the nurses and orderlies moved quietly around, clad in white gowns and strange masks with tiny holes for their eyes. They seemed like the embodied delirium of the fevered patients. The large apparition in the center of the room was the ward surgeon. Instead of a gown he wore an old-fashioned night shirt over his uniform, and when he moved his fat puttees gleamed cheerfully through the slits in the side. Here I tiptoed from bed to bed, hesitating sometimes to speak the word that would call a dying boy back from his dream-world to the world of pain, yet knowing that his "Write mother not to worry and give her my love" would be the most precious message one could send a sorrowing mother.

But it was n't all sad! For days before Christmas the wards were strewn with bright tissue paper and tinsel, and the boys made decorations and paper dolls for the Christmas tree that I had planned for the French children of the village. Big, clumsy boys from the mountains of Virginia became expert with the paste and water-colors, and sometimes the nurse smiled and took the scissors from reluctant fingers, after she had looked at the thermometers.

Christmas morning, just as they used to do at home, they reached out first of all for the presents beside their beds — a Red Cross bag full of candy and little gifts, with a message from some loyal American woman who may never know how much her work was appreciated, and new socks filled with nuts. Then, boylike, they began "swapping" gifts. The cheerful young voices ring out in genuine mirth. "My sweater is from Texas — any of you guys get one from Iowa? I want to swap!" And further down the row a jolly little Irish boy who has lost a leg calls merrily to a neighbor, "Hey, cripple, want to swap your shaving cream for one of these yere shoe laces? I guess we only rate one apiece!"

They will never forget the tiny three-year-old girl whom I brought in to thank them for their paper dolls. She stood on a chair and sang in her sweet baby voice:

"Eet 's a lon', lon' gway to Teeper*arr*ee,
But my heart zright zhere!"

Then she sang the "Marseillaise," and waved a little American flag. When the boys clapped and shouted, she hesitated a moment whether to laugh or cry, and then, with a charming little French gesture, she kissed her hand, and hid behind me. But she was only coquetting, for she was n't a bit shy as I lifted her up to shake hands with each boy. Some of the big mountain men just looked at the tiny hand in theirs and turned their heads on the pillows; but I think the baby understood.

But here I 've been seeing pictures, instead of giving an expert account of the work of a Red Cross Searcher! The editor of the War Volume will be reaching for his waste-basket, and I should redeem myself by becoming serious at once. Yet somehow it all comes back to me in pictures, and if I can make him see them perhaps he will understand.

"Searching" just means trying to find out from each man the exact facts concerning the killed or missing in his company. The picture that comes to mind is very clear,— serious, interested faces bending over a map while some one points out the town nearest to the spot where the shell burst "just as we were coming out of the dugout." "Oh, yes, I saw it happen — he was my buddy, and we were always together." And the story is told with awful simplicity by a boy into whose eyes creeps the look that one sees only in the eyes of those who have seen unforgettable things.

"Answering hospital inquiries" was another duty the thought of which brings back the registrar's office at night — blinds tightly closed, for fear of air raids, and noisy typewriters pounding out the new lists of wounded. I search through thousands of cards in the files, looking to see if any of the hundreds of names on the daily list sent out by the Red Cross are among the hospital records. These names all represent anguished appeals to the Red Cross for news of men who have been reported wounded or killed. As I work, two men beside me are keeping up a noisy fire of arrant nonsense — but I join in now and then, for I know they are joking to keep up their spirits as they inventory the pathetic little keepsakes of the boys who have gone West that day. I search through three big files of names —"Active," "Transferred," or "Returned to Duty." And now and then I take out a card which reads, "Final disposition — Death," and put it reverently back in the file that army regulations with unconscious felicity have decreed for it — among those who have "Returned to Duty."

Space is too brief for me to share the stories which the letters in my folder tell, each giving to sorrowing ones at home details of death and burial that they would otherwise never know. As I glance through my accounts of the military funerals I see again the little cemetery facing the West, on the slope of the lovely hillside behind the village church. As the flag-draped coffins are carried through the gate, two little French girls lay beside the wreath I place there bouquets of moss and everlasting, tied with the tricolors. When the firing-squad has fired the last volley, and "taps" has echoed back, they turn to me with some puzzled question: "One plays good night so that the dead will sleep, n'est-ce pas?" Then, childlike, they run to pick up the empty cartridges, and make faces as they pass the enclosure where the "mauvais Boches" are buried. But they never forget to kneel and say a little prayer before they go, sometimes at the grave of the "grand sergeant" who had been a favorite with the village children, sometimes at the grave of "l'infirmière Américaine," to whose funeral half the countryside brought armfuls of roses.

As time goes on they will forget to make faces at the Boches, but they will never forget to say their little prayer for the souls of the brave American boys who sleep so far from home. The rows on rows of simple white crosses will be a mute reminder of America's service, and the children of France will tend with loving hands the graves of those who rest in foreign soil, but under the same stars that watch over France and America.

L'ŒUVRE DES PETITS BLESSÉS

The First Boston University War Charity

Frances B. S. Waxman

[Mrs. Frances B. S. Waxman, wife of Dr. Samuel M. Waxman, Assistant Professor of Romance Languages in the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University, is American chairman of L'Œuvre des Petits Blessés.]

TO the Cercle Français of Boston University belongs the credit and the honor of having been the first of the college organizations to interest itself in war relief work. The history of the Paris charity, for which the members of the Cercle are patrons, parallels closely the course of the Great War. Begun in the fall of 1914, under the direction of L' Union des Femmes de France, the work consisted during the first winter of the war in sending supplies to the sorely-tried field hospitals in France. Two French ladies, Mlles. Guillier and Aguais, offered their pension, at 21 rue Valette, Paris, as a distributing base for this work. The money which supported the charity was contributed largely by persons who had at various times stopped at the pension and who had therefore a personal interest in any war activity directed by the ladies at its head. Acting as their representatives were Miss May Guinness, of Dublin, who forwarded to Paris the money collected in England and Ireland, and Mrs. Samuel M. Waxman, of Cambridge, who was chairman of the informal committee directing the collections in this country.

By the end of the first winter of the war, the task of supplying the field hospitals had become organized on a large scale under the governments of the different warring nations, helped by many large and well-patronized societies both here and in Europe. The ladies of the house in the rue Valette decided, therefore, that their house could increase its usefulness by becoming a convalescent shelter, still distributing hospital supplies and clothing, as contributions of these things were sent them from the committee in the United States. Accordingly, in April, 1915, Mlles. Guillier and Aguais established a convalescent service at their house with the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars raised by the students of the French Cercle at a memorable performance of "Le Voyage de M. Perrichon." The new branch of the charity became known as L'Œuvre des Petits Blessés, and the soldiers who enjoyed its hospitality were sent there by an organization connected with the Ministry of War, L'Assistance aux Convalescents Militaires, with headquarters at 202 Boulevard Saint Germain, Paris. The house at 21 rue Valette is one of the semi-private establishments to which the Assistance was glad to send its men in order to provide some home life for them. The ladies asked to have sent them men who were really homeless, those principally from the occupied districts of France and from the colonies, too far from their homes to pass their leaves with their families. Convalescents from all the horrible consequences of war have been sheltered by the œuvre. They have stayed for visits of varying lengths, from a few days to four or five weeks. During the winter of the armistice leaves were extended and the men given small jobs of outside work in order to accustom them again to civil life after five years of war.

The small sum of money which started this work was added to from time to time through the kindly coöperation of a group of French teachers in the private schools of Boston and by contributions from the friends of the ladies at its head. In May, 1915, a number of the private schools of Boston combined, and under the supervision of their French teachers gave a very beautiful and successful Fête Champêtre in the grounds of the Misses Cushman's school at Chestnut Hill, by which nearly $700 was raised. A booth at the Allied Bazaar, arranged by Mrs. Waxman, brought in $600. Then there have been liberal donations from time to time from private individuals, while the yearly entertainments of the Cercle Français have always added something to the fund. After the entry of the United States into the war, other groups of the college interested themselves in the Œuvre, and by the end of the college year of 1918 they had contributed nearly $500 to its support. The Women Graduates' Club donated the sum of $150, part of the proceeds of their Authors' Readings; the Girls' Glee Club and the Gamma Delta Society each sent to France the money raised at their entertainments; the Faculty Ladies' Club contributed the surplus left in their treasury at the end of the college year; and the class of 1918 of the College of Business Administration generously decided to eliminate their senior reception and devote the money it would have cost to the Œuvre des Petits Blessés. The faculty of the College of Business Administration added $25 to the $100 voted by the class, thus insuring an additional month of usefulness to the little charity.

Since the Œuvre could never at any time count on much money ahead, Mlle. Guillier wisely decided to keep her family of soldiers small. Her official quota was three men per day, but that number varied somewhat, depending on the number of men on leave arriving in Paris at a time. Usually when the time of leaves overlapped, there were five and six members of the little soldier family in the rue Valette. It was estimated that the cost of caring for these men was about one hundred dollars a month, although as food became scarcer and more costly in Paris this sum had to be increased, and that, too, just at the time when contributions over here became fewer, owing to the many new demands made by the American war activities upon generous people. Mlle. Guillier has kept a scrupulous record of her work and of its expenditures, and in order to have its history preserved over here she has sent to the French Cercle photographs of the men who have enjoyed their hospitality and a word of thanks from each of them. These records have been carefully guarded, and they will be preserved in order that future generations of Boston University students may know just what part those of to-day took in the Great War. The members of the organization whose initiative founded the Œuvre were given credit in France for their efforts by having the charity for which they are patrons classified in the French war records as "Fondation du Cercle Français de l'Université de Boston."

The work of demobilization having begun in France during the winter of the armistice, and the funds of the Œuvre having been nearly exhausted, Mlle. Guillier was obliged by February to cease regularly receiving soldiers in her pension. She continued through the spring of 1919 her aid to the wards of the Œuvre — those who on demobilization were most in need of material help. The task of rehabilitation in France, particularly for the men of the devastated areas, is so enormous that the trifling gifts the Œuvre's funds can make to the brave men of France who have lost everything by the war are a mere drop in the bucket. Nevertheless, they are as grateful for this help, and the sympathy and understanding that go with it, as if the gifts really measured up to their needs. No doubt the French Government's reimbursements to these people, and the benevolence of some of the larger and more influential charities, will finally help them all to build up a semblance of their former lives once more. Meanwhile, although the Cercle Français cannot again count on sending to France any such sums of money as the vivid years of the war made available for their work, they mean to keep in touch with some of their beneficiaries in order that they may feel themselves really a French society with a worthy Raison d'Être. They are planning next year to use whatever money they may raise by their entertainments to help in the education of two little boys whose father was killed in the early days of the war. They hope to establish for the children a permanent fund which will be available for their needs as they grow up, thus doing a bit of reconstruction work of their own which will help them keep in personal touch with the country whose language and literature they are learning and whose high political ideals are shared by our own sister republic.

Appended are two documents which are pertinent to a history of the Œuvre. One is a letter testifying to its usefulness, and the other is a report of its gifts and expenses, printed in France and sent to the contributors in this country by Mlle. Guillier.

PARIS, 14 Novembre, 1918.

Je viens au nom de l'Assistance aux Convalescents Militaires, attester que votre formation est rattachée depuis 1915 à notre Œuvre, et que vous n'avez cessé d'y hospitaliser des militaires permissionaires, ce que nous a rendu les plus grands services.

Je viens en même temps vous témoigner toute ma reconnaissance ainsi qu' au "Cercle des Etudiants de Boston University" et à Madame Waxman.

Veuillez agréer, Mademoiselle, l'assurance de mes sentiments distingués et dévoués.

Le Délégué Régionale du Gouvernement Militaire de Paris,
L. DELACOURTY

ŒUVRE DU CERCLE FRANCAIS DE BOSTON UNIVERSITÉ ET DE NOS AMIS EN AMÉRIQUE, DITE "ŒUVRE DES PETITS BLESSÉS"

L'Œuvre a reçu en dons, du 15 avril 1915 à fin janvier 1919, la somme de 25.904 fr. 55.

L'Œuvre a hébergé, du 15 avril 1915 à fin janvier 1919, 384 militaires, convalescents ou permissionnaires, donnant un total de 3672 journées d'hébergement. Elle leur a également fait parvenir des Colis de vivres et de vêtements chauds.

L'Œuvre continue à entretenir une correspondance avec les militaires des régions envahies afin de rester en relation avec eux, de les soutenir par un réconfort moral et de venir en aide aux familles nombreuses éprouvées.

YOUNG AMERICA AT CHÂTEAU-THIERRY

In War, 1918; in Peace, 1919

President L. H. Murlin

"THE best way to visit the battlefields of France" is the commercial appeal now being made by tourist agencies to the interested and curious. It is a thousand pities that these sacred fields must be subjected to the gaze of the blasé, the mawkish, or the curious; it would seem an insult to the boys who fought there and gave their lives for world freedom that these battlefields should now become the prey and pastime of the tourist and the jaded globe-trotter. The historian should go; the artist should be given free access; the poet should be allowed to move freely where McCrae wrote:

> "In Flanders fields where poppies blow

and fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, relatives, and sweethearts should be found there in large numbers to plant flowers on the graves of loved ones, to water those flowers with their tears, and to reconsecrate the soil with their own sweet devotion. But to allow the exploiter, the blasé, the curious, to desecrate this soil — never!

That first week of June, 1918, was a glorious one for France, for America, for the world. Marshal Foch's movement on July 18 — six weeks later — started the oncoming wave which engulfed and destroyed Prussianism; but that wave would probably have not been possible but for the valor of our marines and other American troops in this first battle at Château-Thierry. The Germans were making their supreme effort in their last big drive for Paris; they had broken through the supposedly impregnable position of the British at Chemin-des-Dames; day by day they crept nearer and nearer to Paris, from which they were less than forty miles, while some of their outriders touched the rim of the metropolis within seven miles of the Champs Elysées. "We felt in our faces the very breath of the beast," said a prominent Frenchman.

In the midst of an apparently hopeless situation, with its corresponding gloom and depression, from which there seemed no relief, there suddenly flashed the lightning of a new sword, in hands unused to war, but ever ready as were the knights of old to enter the lists — a sword which had never been drawn except for freedom, truth, and justice; a sword which had never known defeat! A division of marines and other American troops was rushed forward as a desperate measure to try to stop the gap where flesh and blood, though animated by French heroism, seemed incapable of further resistance. Neither trained nor equipped for such work, they dashed across France, driving, hiking, scrambling; in trucks, cattle cars, by every conceivable kind of conveyance.

For days they had little food and less sleep. When they arrived the tide was running so strongly against the Allies that the French command not only advised but actually ordered them to retire; but these Yankee lads and their brave general would not hear of it. They dashed for the foe with little care for regulation battle order. Burning with hot indignation at the outrages of the Hun, eager to give expression to that indignation and to show a skeptical Old World what the New could do, they stormed ahead right through French divisions coming back from the front, yelling like wild Indians, ardent, vibrant, irresistible! The returning French called out as they passed: "Don't go there; in that direction are the Boches with their machine guns!" But our boys shouted back: "That 's where we want to go; we 've come three thousand miles to meet the Boche!" They threw themselves upon the victory-flushed Huns, to whom this unconventional kind of fighting was a complete, disconcerting, and overwhelming surprise. They fought like demons and stopped the Hun, starting the Allied victory on its march, never to stop until Armistice Day. The French knew to their unspeakable delight that a new force had joined theirs which spelled victory; and the Huns knew to their unspeakable dismay that a new factor had been added to the opposition that made defeat inevitable.

A year after this glorious week we were there to see what another group of young Americans is doing in completing the work of our boys. We had motored through the Soissons-Rheims-Verdun-Argonne battle areas, winding up at Château-Thierry. Everywhere is most frightful desolation. The once fair and fertile fields of France have become dreary wastes, torn and distraught, buried in heaps on heaps of ruins. As far as the eye can see on either side of miles and miles of road, there is not a whole living tree, an acre of tillable soil, an unwrecked human habitation, nor an undemolished church, where but recently were happy homes, peaceful villages, quiet gardens, abundant harvests, and worshiping congregations. But that is not the worst: these outward and physical conditions are expressions of a more grave inner and spiritual danger — intellectual despair, social ruin, and spiritual barrenness, a condition sure to drive to madness the refugees returning home. Home? Well, it is all they have: ashes, dust, dirt, and débris of their former life — and nothing else! Nothing to eat, little to wear, no kitchen utensils, no household furniture, no tools, no farming implements, no seed-corn for the next planting! Nothing! Nothing but drab desolation, the remains of deadly destruction! Broken in body, broken in fortunes, broken in families, broken in social fellowships, broken in religious consolations, broken in spirit — broken in heart! This faintly suggests the problem of our workers there, in restoring the morale of these people.

I would not detract one iota from the imperishable glory that belongs to our boys who here turned the tide of battle against the brutal Hun. But this very winter our group of workers is facing at Château-Thierry a more fatal and subtle enemy who will crush out the spirit and life of this people. There is an appealing call for help in rebuilding homes, villages, and towns, in starting industries, and opening schools and churches. Let us be glad that that work is already beginning in a small way. But it must be very slow. The immediate, most difficult, and most important problem is that of sustaining the morale of these people in the meantime, particularly this winter. Something must be done to reawaken their hopes, to stir their ambitions, to arouse their benumbed spirits, to start their personal lives again. As matters now stand they move about as wooden automatons, in a hopeless, dumb, lifeless way. To awaken them to manly action, to bring them back to something of their former selves, is a far more difficult task than to do battle, however nobly and bravely done; to do this work requires warm sympathies, trained minds, rare skill, consummate tact, unfailing endurance, and monumental patience; and the men and women who are performing this rare service deserve our lasting gratitude.

There is no end of good impulses and good intentions on the part of the American people. But will it all end in good intentions and "surveys"? At last accounts eighty-five American commissions had been in France "to make a survey" and to report to some home philanthropic body; in the meantime these people are freezing to death or starving, while the home societies will probably have spent their funds on "commissions" and "surveys." The French are getting pretty tired of being "surveyed" by "commissions." What they want is bread and clothing, but more, even, love and comradeship.

I am pleased to report that our people are there with the goods! We have opened orphanages, agricultural schools, and model farms; of these I have not space here to speak. I wish to give you a little detail of one fraction of what we are doing in France, at Château-Thierry. The French Government has assigned to us thirty-two villages along the Marne covering a distance of twenty-five miles, with Château-Thierry in the center. They are described in Mildred Aldrich's book, "A Hilltop on the Marne." Just above our villages are the three villages assigned to the unit from Wellesley College.

We attended a conference of our workers in these villages. From the railroad station one walks up "President Wilson Avenue" to "United States Square," where, at Number 4, is the property we have purchased, an old stone mansion — lately a hotel — with twenty-five rooms built around a large court, with lounging rooms, offices, etc., on the ground floor, and a big fireplace at one side. It is only a stone's throw from the bridge where our boys first met the Germans; it is less than one hundred yards from the spot where the first American boy fell. Does not the heart thrill? These boys stood in the struggle for world liberty where our men of Lexington and Concord stood for American freedom. Here, then, in sight of these inspiring memories, is the setting of our fine home for our workers in these villages. They are supplied with automobiles so that they can spend the day out among the people in the villages and come back to headquarters at night for rest, refreshment, and recuperation. Such work is a heavy drain upon the physical and nervous forces; it requires a lot of encouragement and good cheer to sustain oneself amid the hard service which these trained workers are rendering; this "Central Foyer" provides such a refuge.

In the villages our workers are provided with tents, huts, or halls, as a Community Center — and a real Community Center it is. There is not a store, school, church, assembly room, not even a corner grocery in any of these villages; this Community Center seeks to provide everything for these people as a community. Every day the women come to this center to plan for the simplest household necessities; our workers help them; materials are provided at a price adapted to the purse — perhaps these workers have a community sewing machine, or baking oven, or washboard. A survey has been made so that the physical, economic, mental, moral, and social status of every one in the village is known and the price of all articles is adapted to the purse. Once a week "sales" are held when household supplies are offered. These have been purchased in large quantities from the disbanding armies, the Red Cross establishments, Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, etc., and in some cases the Food Administration has helped; by the aid of gifts from Americans other goods were bought from the manufacturers. If there is any profit it is spent in providing something of special helpfulness and value to the village as a whole.

The older boys and girls are taught games and are also trained to lead the younger children. During five years of Hun occupation their fathers and brothers were murdered, their mothers and sisters endured the horror and terror of Hunnish lust; five years of the fears and frights of war and of Hun occupation have been theirs — and the shadow of it is still with them. You may well believe, therefore, that they have known little of happiness. Life has been a continuous nightmare, and nearly a million of them and their mothers have perished under war strain. It is into these lives our workers are trying to put a little of sunshine, hope, good cheer, and companionship.

Then, too, the fathers must have attention. Five years of soldier life have unfitted them for the ordinary duties of domestic and civic life. War is reversion to savagery, and arouses the brutal passions and animal instincts. Besides, the soldier is apt to think that he has done his duty to his country, his community — and often, even, to his family; he thinks, now, that these should take care of him; whereas his country, community, and family never needed him so much as now. Something must be done, and that quickly, to persuade him to find his place in the current economic life; to perform his duty there just as faithfully as he did in the war. He does not, as yet, appreciate the fact that now he must be a soldier in peace, fighting the enemies of the ordinary run of life; that to be a slacker in the economic life of peace time is just as big a piece of treachery and disloyalty as to be a slacker in time of war when fighting the Hun. For this reason the soldiers need much special attention; they must be brought together and ways and means tactfully suggested, discussed, approved, and organized to get them at work for the betterment of their respective communities.

I have said all this to lead you up to an appreciation of the greatness of the work these young people are doing; and that you may appreciate the qualities of mind and heart which must be theirs. They are, for the most part, university graduates, who, in addition to their university training, have had special training in social service, and have had considerable practical field experience. To illustrate: one is a university graduate in both America and England, with special training in social work; she was for seventeen months director of a foyer at the front. She was attached to the 7th Division of the French Army conducting a roadside canteen; three times her canteen was destroyed but she worked on; received a Croix de Guerre with three citations from the French Army.

The conference which we attended lasted for two hours. These workers gave reports of what they had been doing the past week; their plans were discussed and a program agreed upon — supplies, parties, community meetings, sales, etc., for the week to come. Here is a brief extract from one report. This is typical of what these twelve workers were doing in these thirty villages:

"Not a single habitable house remained in Vaux; not a piece of furniture, just great piles of lime and stone, with a few walls looming up to remind us of what had once been a village. Those fortunate enough to have three walls — four seem almost wasteful — have put on temporary roofing.

"Their need is great. They have nothing absolutely but their crushed spirits; but they seem anxious to emerge into something brighter, and they greet us as if through us they see a ray of hope that something better is coming to them. Sorrow, loss, and neglect have not killed them. They have it in them to survive. People who develop amid such a clutter, and are good and at times happy, are a wonderful people."

I consider that the work being done by these young people is as worthy of commendation, sympathy, and support as the work of our boys in resisting the Hun and driving him out of this region. An enemy even more terrible than the Hun is now lurking in these villages along the Marne. He represents cold, hunger, destitution far beyond the most gifted imagination to picture, and a sense of utter helplessness and of general breakdown impossible to endure alone. It is the part of these dozen workers to do for the rehabilitation of the life of the spirit of the people in this brief sector along the Marne what our boys did for the world by their fighting at the bridge across the Marne at Château-Thierry. To inspire these dozen workers there is no longer the huge impact of a great war carried on under the eyes of the whole world. If looked at as work alone it is the dullest monotony and the dreariest kind of drudgery; unknown, unseen, unsung by the world at large. Not one of them but could easily find pleasant positions in America at comfortable salaries. But they are working for small pay and are giving all their time and strength and talent to this work, denying themselves not only comforts but sometimes necessities in order to aid these people. Of course you are not surprised that a happier company of people cannot be found anywhere. Their names ought to be inscribed on rolls of honor; they should be awarded medals of peace, for the battles of peace are far more difficult to fight than the battles of war.

Wars do not end with the signing of armistices nor are the aims of war gained through victories in battle. The Allies won the war, but it is not at all certain that they have won the peace — in the sense that they are securing the aims of the war, namely, to "make the world safe for democracy." The democratic hope of Europe is represented in almost forty republics which were organized in Europe during the first armistice year. Their fate is trembling in the balance at this hour. Europe faces monarchism or bolshevism if these republics fail. We have left them practically alone to begin this new and great experiment in government, unskilled and untrained in such endeavors, and beginning it under the most difficult economic situation that the human race has ever known. They are bitterly opposed, on the one hand, by the autocracy of monarchism, and on the other by the still more merciless and relentless autocracy of bolshevism. The frightful collapse that comes upon human beings after superhuman endeavor has come upon these peoples in Europe after five years of war strain. They needed us fully as much — perhaps even more — during the first year or two after the armistice as they did in the last year of the fighting. If, in ten thousand centers all over Europe, particularly in these new republics, we could have had groups of workers like these at Château-Thierry inspiring the morale of the people, helping them to organize their domestic and civic life, and if, in addition, we could have sent them helpers to organize their industries and transportation, and had extended to them credit so they could start their industrial and commercial activities, and if we could have kept our food administration going, supplying them with the necessities of food and clothing — if all these humane activities could have been carried on with the Knights of Columbus, the Y. M. C. A., the Red Cross, in full swing, as during the last year of the war, we should be facing a different Europe today. We should be quite as willing to be as active and generous in supporting constructive reconstruction endeavors in times of peace as we were in promoting destructive endeavor in times of war.

AFTER THE ARMISTICE

Heber R. Harper

[Heber R. Harper, A.B., S.T.B., is Assistant Professor of Hebrew and Greek in the School of Theology of Boston University.]

THE armistice had come with stunning suddenness. After months of all-consuming activity and intensity came the collapse, and then unendurable inactivity. With its great motive gone, and the enforced idleness of long, long days, the morale of the A. E. F. was in striking contrast to the morale of its fighting days. The moods and activities of the doughboy during his long sojourn in Europe after the armistice were quite different from the moods and activities of his fighting days.

In the first place, he had a desperate case of homesickness. During the war a prominent speaker, who lisps a little, said: "I found three thingth characterithtic of all our boyth wherever I thaw them in Franth. In the firth plathe they were alwayth hungry, in the thecond plathe they were alwayth broke, and in the third plathe no matter where they were they withed they were thomewhere elthe." Certainly the third thing was characteristic of every doughboy during the after-the-armistice period, and there was absolute unanimity as to the whereabouts of that other place. It was "God's Country" that was wanted — Home! The A. E. F. had the worst case of homesickness ever known — and the biggest. They were homesick for home food, for thin china and white tablecloths, for white sheets, for the front porch and a rocking-chair, and above all for their own folks. Van Dyke spoke for every doughboy when he wrote:

> " 'T is fine to see the Old World and to travel up and down
> Among the famous palaces and cities of renown, —
> To admire the crumbly castles and the statues of the kings, —
> But now I think I 've had enough of antiquated things.
> So it 's home again and home again, America for me;
> My heart is turning home again and there I long to be
> In the land of youth and freedom beyond the ocean bars,
> Where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars."

Many activities were promoted or supported by the army during this period of comparative idleness, designed among other things to combat this homesickness. By far the most significant of these activities was the educational program of the A. E. F.

Over two hundred thousand doughboys attended the army schools. Of this number approximately twenty thousand did college or university work. About two thousand men went to British universities, and over eight thousand were in French universities,— the Sorbonne, Grenoble, Lyon, Besançon, and others. At the beautiful little French town of Beaune, Côte d'Or, the army utilized the buildings that had been erected for one of the two largest American hospitals in which to set up its own university. This A. E. F. University comprised eleven different colleges and had a total enrolment of over eight thousand students. Dr. Flewelling, a graduate of Boston University, had charge of the Department of Philosophy in the Liberal Arts School. At the town of Allerey, four or five kilometers from Beaune, was a splendid school of agriculture with over two thousand students.

The resourcefulness of the doughboy was demonstrated in his school activities as well as in his fighting. There were almost innumerable obstacles to be overcome in order to get things under way. One of the chief difficulties was the securing of text-books. A member of the Educational Commission, Dr. Erskine, of Columbia University, was sent to America to place an order for one million five hundred thousand dollars' worth of text-books. He found that the War Industries Board had placed a ban on the manufacture of text-books and white paper. Getting the ban lifted meant delay. Many of the classes, therefore, had to be started with no books, or at best with a very limited number. But doughboy resourcefulness, and determination not to be defeated, easily got around this situation.

A private, for example, secured as an instructor in Greek, was confronted with this handicap: this young Rhodes Scholar, who had left Oxford to enlist in France, was teaching a class in advanced Greek, while his captain had the beginning class! The only text he had for both classes was a French edition of the seventh book of Plato's "Republic," which he had kicked up out of the ruins at Verdun. With this text alone to aid his memory he had compiled all the conjugations, declensions, vocabularies, and exercises for the captain's beginning class, and the lexicon, grammar exercises, etc., for his advanced class. This was only one of many proofs that Yankee fighting spirit did not die with the signing of the armistice.

In France the doughboy was quietly going to school to learn better how to live and how to work. In Germany he had others learning how to live by attending his school — the great School of Democracy. He was the instructor, and those of the occupied territory were his pupils. For as an American Democracy had turned out a fighter that surprised the world, she also turned out a conqueror who was a splendid vindication of the principles for which he had fought. In Germany he was a living lesson in democracy to those whose land he was occupying. There was nothing of the swashbuckling, overbearing, arrogant spirit in this conqueror. He simply could not play that rôle because it was foreign to his nature. He was democratic because he was to the manner born. In the eyes of some of our professional military men he was too democratic. But whatever weaknesses his fraternizing tendencies may have had, they were more than counterbalanced by the quiet lessons he was giving in democracy — lessons that were by no means lost on his friend the enemy.

All the lessons, however, were not passively given. Every day an American outfit paraded the streets of Coblenz with the American flag flying to remind an otherwise uninvaded people that autocracy was crushed and that democracy was triumphant. Many a portly German burgher learned for the first time, by the sweep of a doughboy's arm, that hats off was the rule when the flag went by or when the "Star Spangled Banner" was played. At Coblenz, too, the Stars and Stripes floated constantly over Ehrenbreitstein, Germany's greatest fortress — her Gibraltar of the Rhine. No American ever viewed that sight for the first time without a wonderful thrill and a wild desire to shout. No German could look at that from day to day without catching something of its significance.

There were some unfortunate exceptions to the doughboy's general democratic bearing and deportment, but so few that it can truthfully be said that no more magnanimous or manly conqueror ever occupied an enemy's country.

The doughboy's last notable appearance as part of the A. E. F. was in the Allies' great victory pageant on July 14, 1919. There has been no pageant in all history to compare with this one when the victorious hosts of the armies of the free peoples of the world marched under the Arc de Triomphe. Paris worked feverishly for ten days to be properly decorated for the great event. The Champs d' Elysées was a blaze of color. Bunting, pennants of the Allied flags, and thousands of electric lights were strung the entire length of the Avenue, hung from Venetian poles. From double square columns, surmounted by winged balls, hung shields with figures symbolic of the great battles of the war.

The most unique decoration was two great heaps of captured German cannon, one on either side of the Avenue. These had formerly stretched the entire length of this renowned thoroughfare. Now they had been scooped up and flung together as a mass of scrap — two junk heaps. Their appearance well reflected the contempt with which the Allies regarded the "Might" doctrine for which they had stood. On one heap was the Cock of France, with head lowered and feathers ruffled, standing on a ball marked "1914," and entitled, "Le Coq se défend." On the other heap the Cock, with head erect and proud in bearing, on the ball marked "1918," was entitled, "Le Coq Chant."

Enormous crowds flocked to Paris for the parade. All the night before a tremendous throng jammed the avenues and danced and sang along the boulevards. By midnight the Champs d' Elysée was lined with people five rows deep who had located themselves with blankets and with something to eat for petit déjeuner the following morning.

After establishing friendly relations with a poilu who was on guard at the Arch, one observer placed himself within the circle surrounding the Arch itself and slept all night under some German cannon that were being frowned down upon by the figure of Napoleon. About four o'clock in the morning workmen began to roll from under the Arch the great Cenotaph to the Dead, past which millions had filed the night before to drop a flower and a tear in grateful remembrance of those who had made this day possible.

The sun rose beautiful and clear, ushering in a perfect day. The crowd was being tremendously augmented. The roofs of all the surrounding buildings were black with people. The observer had taken a position about twenty feet in front of the Arch, so as to see the world's great warriors and their great chiefs just as they passed through that structure which, more than any other could possibly do, symbolized their great victory and the winning of freedom for the world.

From the Avenue de la Grande Armée were heard the trumpeters of the famous French Garde Républicaine as they flared forth the strains of the "Marseillaise" in blasts that it seemed could be heard around the world. The first to pass under the Arch were the blind and wounded. With streaming eyes the spectators showered them with flowers and with cries of "Merci! Merci!!" Then came Joffre and Foch riding together. The cheering of the throng was deafening. They seemed to be borne along by a never-faltering wave of acclamation from the grateful-hearted multitude.

The first troops to pass through were our own boys. Following the striking figure of their leader they marched in marvelous form. Some one said, "No Americans ever marched like that before." And it was true. Their lines were perfect, and each man as erect as though supported by an invisible steel rod. They were unanimously proclaimed as having exhibited the finest form in the parade. Following the Yanks came the Belgians, then the British. All the Allies of France received the fullest-hearted expressions of affection and admiration. Italians, Japanese, Greeks, Poles, Portuguese, Roumanians, Serbs, Czecho-Slovaks — for all, it seemed, was given the greatest possible demonstration. But when France's own poilus appeared there went up a thunder of cheers and cries of "Merci aux Poilus" that reached the skies. France was paying homage to her own sons, the saviors of France and of the world. It was the homage of undying love, gratitude, and devotion, and it was gloriously and worthily rendered.

It was a fitting climax to see the doughboy for the last time in this pageant of unrivaled splendor and significance, joined with those with whom he had shared the mud and the blood, the loneliness and pain, the wounds and death, that had made possible this hour of glory and of triumph.

MILITARY ACTIVITIES OF BOSTON UNIVERSITY IN THE WORLD WAR

Students' Army Training Corps

Starkey Y. Britt

[Captain Starkey Y. Britt, Commandant of the Students' Army Training Corps, was retired from active service in the United States Army a few years before the World War on account of disability incurred in line of duty, but had been on active duty since the beginning of the war.]

ON April 6, 1917, our Congress declared that "war existed between Germany and the United States of America." From that day we, the people of the United States, were a party to the greatest conflict that ever engaged the attention of mankind. The war had been in progress since the first week in August, 1914, between the principal nations of Europe, but we had, by the exercise of much forbearance and patience under sore provocation, been spared active participation on the field of battle.

War is not a thing to be desired by any sane person. Its methods are so drastic, its results so dreadful and far-reaching, that it should be, and generally is, the last resort of any really civilized and humane people. We had suffered indignities and many invasions of our rights at the hands of the Central Powers of Europe, until patience had ceased to be a virtue.

The declaration of war found the United States unprepared. Both the physical and the financial forces, or powers, of the country were unorganized, except for a small regular army, which was so small that in a conflict of such magnitude as the World War it could hardly be considered as a "corporal's guard."

Problems arose and multiplied with great rapidity, but the first great problem to be met was to get a sufficient force ready for immediate combat — a force large enough to stem the avalanche that was threatening almost every free and democratic country in Europe. The second great problem was to devise and put into operation a plan that would not only fill the gaps that might occur in the fighting line, but would enable the Government to enlarge the combat force whenever the exigencies of war might so require.

The conflict was of such stupendous magnitude that it was soon evident that voluntary enlistments would never be of such numbers as to successfully meet the necessities of the second problem; accordingly, what is known as the "draft law" was enacted by the national Congress. Under this law soldiers in sufficient numbers could be drawn from among the able-bodied men of the country to meet all the numerical requirements, and the Government could get all the men it needed. There then arose another problem, as serious as any of those problems connected with the handling of men or armies in active campaign — the lack of trained officers.

Leadership has been termed by some as a "gift," and it cannot be denied that some men possess this qualification largely in excess of their fellows, but in these days of high-powered weapons, leadership in battle is not so much a gift as it is a matter of training. Technical training is essential for the officer. The officer's word is absolute law in battle, and the officer who blunders in action may be the cause of scores of deaths among the men under his command.

Again, it is a well-established truth in military as well as civil pursuits that a man must have a good general education before he can be well trained, technically, in any line of endeavor.

In organizing the great army for service in Europe, the Government found that it could get all the men it needed, all the men it wanted; but it discovered that it was difficult to obtain a sufficient number of men educated up to the point where they could be technically trained as officers. This is not surprising when we consider the relatively few men who complete a college course and the large number of officers required to handle an army of four or five millions of men. From what source could the Government get the proper material for more than a hundred and eighty thousand officers? It was evident that the larger colleges and universities of the country were the proper source of supply of officer material. Approximately five hundred of the larger institutions of learning throughout the country were requested to undertake, for the duration of the war, the basic training of their able-bodied male students along the lines that would fit them for a subsequent technical training for positions as officers in Government camps and schools. A commission was contemplated for each man who could qualify.

Boston University, an old and well-known institution of learning, situated in the heart of Boston, readily responded to the Government's request, opened its doors, and placed its educational equipment and machinery at the service of not only our own people but the peoples of the world at large who were in a life-and-death struggle with autocracy.

Germany and Austria had challenged the world. These autocratic governments had set out to enslave, or at the least to dominate, the world. Sacred treaties had been treated as "scraps of paper." Confronting the great popular governments of the world was the threat that no longer should they enjoy liberty and freedom, but that henceforth they should bend their necks to a yoke of arrogance and "kultur."

The World War was not of our choosing. Our Government had exhausted every means, save national honor, to avoid the conflict. Each step on our part looking to avoidance was met by the Central Powers of Europe with further aggression and encroachment on our rights. Congress, in declaring war, but gave voice to the wish of every patriotic American.

As previously shown in this article, the Government had determined upon the training of every able-bodied college student, this training to be given in his own college. These students were to be full soldiers in the service of the United States, to be known as the "Students' Army Training Corps." Army officers were assigned to each college and university having a corps of students in training. These officers were to train the men in military drill a certain number of hours each day, and the students were at the same time required to pursue their regular college studies under college professors. This system of training — a double system carried on at the same time — called for energetic work on the part of the student.

Military drill and discipline became a part of the college course for the men who enlisted as members of the Students' Army Training Corps. The machinery of the colleges was placed under Government control, and notwithstanding that the Government paid the institutions for their services, the change was radical and somewhat startling. But the interest of the country was put in the foremost place by our colleges and universities, and whether or not the service to the country, in training these young men, was carried on at cost or at a financial loss, Boston University did not swerve from its desire and its efforts to meet all Government requirements and give to its Students' Army Training Corps the complete training desired.

A Committee on Education and Training, appointed by the War Department, and having its headquarters in Washington, had general charge of all S. A. T. C.'s, and prescribed the courses to be taught and the methods of instruction. The plans outlined by this committee were followed as closely as possible.

The beginning of the fall term, 1918, was designated by the committee in Washington as the time when the training of the students for Government service in the army should begin. Army officers were detailed to educational institutions by the War Department, one or more to each institution, and ordered to report at the institution for duty before the beginning of the fall term.

Captain Starkey Y. Britt, U. S. Army, retired, but again on active duty by order of the President, was detailed as Commandant at Boston University. Captain Britt was retired from active service some few years before the World War, on account of "disability incurred in line of duty," but had been on active duty since the beginning of the war. At the time of his detail to Boston University he was Commandant at the University of Minnesota, and had had several years' experience as commandant and professor of military science and tactics at military colleges. This officer belonged to the "old army," and had a record of more than twenty-four years' service, being a veteran of the Spanish War and the Philippine Insurrection. Captain Britt reported for duty at Boston University September 16, 1918. Twelve young officers were detailed to the University as Captain Britt's assistants (their names appear later). These twelve young officers were upper-classmen in our larger colleges and universities, and had won their army commissions in training camps. They were the right men in the right place, and ably discharged the duties of their position as assistants to the commandant.

As fast as students matriculated and entered the University, they were physically examined by surgeons in the employ of the United States Government, and all who measured up to the army standards were enrolled as members of the Students' Army Training Corps. A few more than eight hundred were admitted to the corps to receive special training for subsequent appointment as officers. One hundred and three were naval students.

Barracks and messing facilities had to be provided, and for these purposes the University secured two large garages for sleeping quarters, mess hall, and kitchen. Bedding was furnished by the Government. Students were also given the regulation army uniform, and they received the pay of the regular soldier.

After examinations were completed, a general induction service was held at which all army students were formally inducted into the service of the country. This service was impressive. The students stood with uplifted right hands and repeated the formal oath of induction, administered by the commandant. This oath pledged the life and the whole-hearted service of each man to his country.

This general induction service was delayed for some days owing to a severe epidemic of influenza in Boston, which finally spread over the entire country. Many schools were temporarily closed, and public gatherings in nearly all the cities of the country were prohibited. Some few cases of influenza developed among the students, but the University was very fortunate, as only two deaths resulted.

Old Boston Common — historic ground — and the Fenway were secured from the Boston city government to be used as drill grounds. Here, each day, the eight hundred men comprising the corps were given their lessons in military drill,— long, weary hours at first,— but the desire to learn was so keen in each student that drilling soon became not so much a lesson as a military review.

Their bearing and discipline were spoken of most highly by visiting army officers. Many of the students seemed to feel the spirit of our forefathers, and to realize that on Boston Common they were on hallowed ground, under the very shadow of the monument that commemorates the heroic deeds of our ancestors.

Popular names for divisions and regiments were general in the World War, and a movement was therefore started to assume the name of "The Bunker Hill Battalion" for the corps at Boston University; but peace, or the armistice, came so quickly that the plan was never carried out, much to the regret of the commandant.

Hardly a month had been spent in training when the Government began to draw men from the corps at Boston University for training in Government camps. When the armistice was declared, the first class, consisting of about fifty men, was in Government camps.

Training along all lines was being pushed rapidly when, on November 11, 1918, the armies in Europe declared an armistice. The Germans sued for this. For some time they had been so mercilessly beaten on every field that they foresaw complete disaster in the further prosecution of the war. To save the further sacrifice of lives, General Foch, the Allied Commander, acceded to the wish of the Germans, and the signing of the armistice virtually ended the war. The Central Powers of Europe were completely defeated.

The war ended; demobilization of the army was ordered. This was almost as great a task as had been the enrolment. Nearly five millions of men, at home and in Europe, were under arms. To get the army back to a peace basis was the problem of the hour.

Each soldier was carefully examined, physically, by an army surgeon, and a complete record of the man made, in every particular, for permanent file in the War Department at Washington. Actual discharges began early in December and were completed by December 21, 1918. Every man of the corps at Boston University was discharged, save one who was sick in hospital, and was sent to the Government hospital at Camp Devens, Mass., to be treated until cured. The University had taken the best care of its sick at one of the city hospitals.

The Students' Army Training Corps had completed the work required of it by its Government in the World War. Their work had been spoken of in the warmest terms by high officials in the War Department. The knowledge of having done one's duty, whether applauded by men or not, will give to every man guided by a sense of duty supreme satisfaction. The approval of one's conscience is of far more value than the plaudits of our fellow-men. The Students' Army Training Corps at Boston University did its duty. There was not a single trial for violation of military laws, and there was not a single desertion from its ranks, a record almost unheard of in a military unit so large. The memory of their service, though short, should be cherished and handed down to their children's children — a priceless heritage.

Boston University did its duty. Both the Corporation and its officers and professors gave money and toil without stint or reservation. As an institution of learning it answered its country's call, whole-heartedly and patriotically, having in view but one thing: to help its Government —to help the world — make sure that liberty and democracy should not perish, and that the peoples of the world should still enjoy the blessings of liberty, freedom, and happiness.

Following is a list of army officers who served with the S. A. T. C. at Boston University from its organization to its demobilization:

1. Captain Starkey Y. Britt, Artillery Corps, U. S. Army, retired, Commandant.
2. 1st Lieut. Harry L. Lowell, 104th Infantry, Quartermaster.
3. 1st Lieut. Walter M. Jarvis, 42nd Infantry, Commanding Hdqrs. Co. and Post Adjutant.
4. 2nd Lieut. Dwight G. W. Hollister, Infantry, Personnel Adjutant.
5. 2nd Lieut. Tscharner D. Watkins, Infantry, Commanding Co. A.
6. 2nd Lieut. Richard L. Simon, Infantry, Commanding Co. B.
7. 2nd Lieut. William Adams, Jr., Infantry, Commanding Co. C.
8. 2nd Lieut. Arthur H. Wehle, Infantry, Commanding Naval Detachment — part time.
9. 2nd Lieut. George C. Wise, Infantry, Co. A.
10. 2nd Lieut. Willard B. Thompson, Infantry, Naval Section.
11. 2nd Lieut. Frederick J. Sweeney, Infantry, Hdqrs. Company.
12. 2nd Lieut. Benjamin T. Ward, Infantry, Company C.
13. 2nd Lieut. Edwin A. Buck, Infantry, Company B.

Miss Julia A. Curran, Secretary to Commandant.

A TEACHER AS STUDENT

Warren O. Ault

[Warren Ortman Ault is Assistant Professor of History in the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University.]

MY experience in the army was without distinction. I was obliged to say sometimes to the queries of friends, "No, I did n't get across, neither did I get a Cross." The returning hero from overseas, however, though he may make me envious, does not make me feel ashamed. Like all soldiers I did what I was told with full acquiescence and with what cheerfulness was possible. Thus I learned something of discipline, which has been defined as "Instant and willing obedience to orders."

My time was divided almost equally between the Medical Department and the field artillery. While in the Medical Department I was stationed at various forts in Boston Harbor. The Medical Department, besides caring for the sick and wounded, is the registrar's office of the army. It is the receiving and discharging office. Consequently the amount of "paper work" in this department is enormous. Specialists in that field are of much value, and it was there that my own work lay. I knew and learned nothing of medicine beyond the essentials of first aid, elementary physiology, and army sanitation. Observation and study taught me something about the management of an army hospital. At the time of my transfer to the artillery I was in charge of the office of the senior surgeon of the coast defenses of Boston, and had been for some months a sergeant. In July, 1918, the War Department threw the officers' training camps open to enlisted men in all departments of the army. I immediately asked for a transfer to the Field Artillery Officers' Training Camp at Camp Taylor, Ky. Probably my principal motive in making this move was the ordinary human desire to get ahead in my profession; for you must remember that at that time we had no notion but that the army might be our profession for some years to come. Other considerations which influenced me were my love of an active, out-door life, and my knowledge and liking for horses and mathematics — both essential factors in Field Artillery. I was the only enlisted man to go to that camp at that time from the coast defenses of Boston, and I had a fine trip. I was in the training camp just fifteen weeks. The routine of those camps is too familiar to warrant description here. The long hours and the hard work were compensated by the friendships formed with a score of fine fellows and by acquaintance with scores more. Over and over again I was carried back in thought to college days. There was the same hurried snatch at this subject and then at that; the same excited cramming for the morrow's quiz; the same envious or exultant comparison of marks; the same rejoicing over a subject "passed" with a minimum of effort expended. To complete the parallel, we had a commencement at the end of our course, received our diplomas, and went home rejoicing. For the war had broken down on us just as we were finishing up. My battalion was the first to be commissioned after the armistice was signed.

The army was a school, and that in form as well as in essence. My first month in the Medical Department was occupied largely with attendance upon lectures in various pertinent subjects. The officers' training camp was an elaborately organized educational institution with an actual enrolment of 14,000 and an anticipated enrolment of 20,000. When fully under way it was expected that this school would turn out a thousand second lieutenants each week. Each student was carrying forty-four hours of work a week. There were no electives, few "snap" courses, a minimum of tardiness, practically no "cutting," and the best of discipline. Many of us have read with what patience we could muster "The Education of Henry Adams," an education in which formal schooling played a minor rôle. It is in that sense also — education as life — that the army was a school. I am glad (now) that I entered the army as a "buck" private. It was just like beginning life all over again. You have lost your job, your property, your friends; you have had to go to a new country and begin at the bottom again. That well-known phrase, "It 's a great life if you don't weaken," is so true as to be an almost inspired statement of the case. I commend the army as a school for the development of self-reliance.

THE S. A. T. C. AT BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Edwin C. Byam

[Edwin Colby Byam is a graduate of the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University, '20.]

BOSTON UNIVERSITY, like four hundred other educational institutions throughout the country, was selected by the Government as a location for a Students' Army Training Corps. Whereas this organization allowed the students at the same time to remain at college and to serve their country, its chief purpose was to give the young men intensive training, in order to make commissioned officers of them in the shortest possible time. Those who showed skill for some other branch of the service were to be trained to be most efficient in that work.

Owing to the influenza epidemic the students of Boston University were not inducted until October 10, 1918, and on October 21 they reported for duty. The organization consisted of two sections, — the S. A. T. C. and the S. N. T. C.,— the former composed of four companies of soldiers totaling 726 men, the latter being a single group of 101 sailors. Captain S. Y. Britt, U.S.A., retired, was the commanding officer, and twelve other officers worked with him.

Every forenoon the student-soldiers attended classes at the University, most of which were those prescribed by the War Department; every afternoon they marched to either the Fenway or Boston Common to drill. The men undertook their training with much enthusiasm and earnestness, and under the capable instruction of the young officers, who were generally well-liked and respected, they showed very rapid improvement; so rapid, in fact, that before the armistice was signed two detachments of soldiers were chosen from them and sent South to complete their training at an officers' training camp.

The admirable spirit of devotion to the cause at hand which prevailed among our brave lads at the front could be noted also in these student-soldiers, as they faithfully and earnestly did their small part. Although these men until the last had no uniforms, no bands nor flying colors by which to march, no firing of cannon nor fallen comrades to urge them on, and although they were far from the scene of action, nevertheless they cheerfully toiled on day by day, doing their very best for their country.

It must be admitted that the spirit of the corps changed entirely after the armistice. All the young men's hopes of reaching the front and showing their mettle beside their older soldier friends were dashed to the ground by this event. What was more natural than that they should desire to return to civilian life as soon as possible, now that their services were no longer needed? Orders soon came for their release, and by December 21, 1918, the entire unit was demobilized.

The question of whether or not the S. A. T. C. was a failure quickly arose. Some have pronounced it so, and have lamented the great expense caused the Government by it. From this point of view the many other acts of the War Department, anticipating a longer war, must also be termed failures. But does it seem right to condemn a plan simply because it did not have time to show its advantages? Military men were confident that, had the war continued, the S. A. T. C. would have proven a huge success. Even as it resulted, the opinion is current that the psychological effect upon the German military authorities of the knowledge that the colleges all over the country were devoting their efforts toward filling the shortage of American officers was considerable.

(Photograph by Notman, Boston)

Credit must here be given to Boston University for its splendid coöperation with the military department in this work. The University did all in its power to help carry out this new plan of the Government. Buildings had to be secured and fitted up for barracks; a mess-hall and food provided; the plan of the academic year changed; new courses added to the college bulletin and others altered. In all this the readiness of the University authorities to do their part in this huge undertaking was quickly perceived and appreciated.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY NAVAL UNIT, 1918

Harry B. Center

[Harry Bryant Center, College of Liberal Arts, '00, is Associate Professor of Journalism in the College of Business Administration of Boston University.]

THE Boston University Naval Unit, established in September, 1918, at the same time that the Students' Army Training Corps was recruited, was a direct result of work begun at the College of Business Administration in March, 1917, a month before the United States entered the World War.

At that time there was a "drive" to recruit the United States Naval Reserve. Mr. John J. Feeley, a graduate of the School of Law, offered to pay the expenses of a free evening course in elementary navigation to be given at the College of Business Administration. Dean Lord accepted this offer, and instruction was begun early in March, 1917, the class meeting for hourly sessions twice a week. The instructor was Captain Robert M. Clark, formerly of the United States Steamship Inspection Service.

About a hundred young men, including many who had already enlisted in the naval reserve and who were in uniform, took advantage of the offer. Among those who registered were many of our own students at the College of Business Administration and the College of Liberal Arts. Nearly every man who took the course later joined the naval reserve, and among them were some of the first to be commissioned ensigns.

This course was, so far as can be learned, the first "service" course in navigation offered by any university or college in the United States. College courses in navigation had been given,— our own College of Liberal Arts had such a course,— but they were courses in mathematics, and made at least plane trigonometry a prerequisite. The service course given by Captain Clark, and similar courses continued during the war at the College of Business Administration, did not presuppose the student's having any mathematical training beyond arithmetic. They were planned especially to give enlisted men in the navy a sufficient knowledge of elementary navigation to pass the entrance examinations to the officer material schools established by the Navy Department immediately after the United States declared war.

At the end of Captain Clark's course, which lasted six weeks, about twenty-five regular students at the College of Liberal Arts and the College of Business Administration desired to continue their study of navigation until the end of the college year in June. Professor Harry B. Center, of the College of Business Administration, had taken an active interest in the course given by Captain Clark and had assisted in the instruction. At the request of this group of students Professor Center continued the work to the end of the year.

In the summer session of 1917 Professor Center conducted a small class in elementary navigation, and at the beginning of the fall term at the College of Business Administration single term courses in elementary navigation and nautical astronomy were added to the regular college curriculum. These, too, were small classes. But in the spring term of 1918 a thirty-hour course was offered free to enlisted men. About one hundred and twenty-five students registered for this course, including several ensigns and a number of petty officers, and the course in nautical astronomy during the same term was taken by about thirty men, a majority of whom were either naval ensigns or lieutenants.

The work was continued in the summer session of 1918, Professor Robert E. Bruce, of the College of Liberal Arts, offering a course in plane trigonometry which was especially arranged to coördinate with Professor Center's course in elementary navigation. In the fall term the service courses at the College of Business Administration were continued, a nominal fee being charged for instruction.

It is interesting to note the grades and ratings of the naval men, about three hundred in number, who have taken advantage of these service navigation courses. The following list is as complete as the records available permit, but rather understates the case:

Lieutenant-Commander	1
Lieutenant Senior Grade	6
Lieutenant Junior Grade	9
Ensigns	21
Chief Boatswains	2
Chief Gunners	1
Chief Machinists	1
Pay Clerk	1
Boatswain's Mates	5
Quartermasters first class	6
Quartermasters second class	4
Quartermasters third class	7
Electricians, Radio	19
Carpenter's Mate	1
Chief Yeomen	8
Yeomen first class	2
Yeomen second class	4
Yeomen third class	2
Seamen first class	101
Seamen second class	98

This work at the College of Business Administration was carried on with the heartiest coöperation of the naval authorities of the First Naval District. To the never-failing interest of Lieutenant Philip P. Chase, in charge of officer material for the district, was the success of these courses especially due. Lieutenant Chase constantly helped by suggestions for increasing the efficiency of the work and enhancing its value to the navy, and showed his active interest by regular attendance at the classes. A large number of the men who took the courses passed the entrance examinations for the officer material schools at Cambridge and at Pelham Bay, N. Y., and were commissioned as ensigns in the Naval Reserve.

When the Navy Department, in September, 1918, announced that naval units in connection with the Students' Army Training Corps plan would be established at universities and colleges, Boston University was awarded a naval section without application. The section was to be of fifty apprentice seamen. Professor Center was at once placed in charge of the selection of these men and was made faculty director of the naval section. Applications were received from students at the College of Liberal Arts, School of Law, and College of Business Administration, and more than a hundred men sought places in the naval section. There had to be some disappointments. In order to be fair, the quota of fifty men was divided among the three schools in proportion to the number from each school who applied. This resulted in the selection of eight men from the College of Liberal Arts, fifteen from the School of Law, and twenty-seven from the College of Business Administration. Preference was given to those who had been students in their respective departments during the preceding year, so that every former student who applied found a place in the naval section, unless he was rejected by the examining physician. There were very few rejections, and Lieutenant John Paul O'Neill, who had charge of the recruiting and examination, paid a high compliment to the physical excellence of the men submitted for examination at Boston University.

While the fifty apprentices were being recruited the size of the naval section was increasing. By a rule of the Navy Department, any enlisted man in the naval reserve might apply for assignment to one of the naval units for study during the winter. This brought back to college a number of men who had been students in the University and who had left school to enlist. Others who had not previously been students were able to join the naval unit if they could meet the college entrance requirements. The size of the naval section was necessarily limited to one hundred, that number being the limit for which quarters were available.

As finally made up, the naval section was composed of forty-nine apprentice seamen, who were sworn into service by Lieutenant O'Neill on October 1, and fifty-one men transferred from active service. Among the latter there were several petty officers, including one chief boatswain's mate and one chief yeoman. From the very beginning the presence in the naval section of so many men who had been in the navy for some months, some from the beginning of the war, made for discipline and earnestness in the work. The naval company was from its first day a coherent, well-disciplined, and well-ordered unit.

Under the S. A. T. C. plan the naval organization at Boston University was a "section" rather than a "unit," and so was under the command of the army officer assigned as commander of the Students' Army Training Corps, who represented the Navy Department for that purpose. Captain Britt appointed Lieutenants Arthur H. Wehle and Willard B. Thompson to take charge of the section. The men were housed at the University's building at 210 Newbury Street, which was remodeled into a barracks, with ample dormitory and toilet accommodations and the necessary office room. The men messed at the S. A. T. C. mess-hall on St. Botolph Street.

The army command of naval men was not wholly satisfactory, through no fault of the officers assigned, but because the two arms of the service have different traditions, different routine, and different customs, and neither one can quite understand the other. The presence of so many men in the section who had been in active naval service made complications inevitable. These men knew their naval routine and etiquette; the army officers knew theirs. The friction that resulted was not serious so far as any effect upon school work went, but the men were not getting the naval atmosphere that was so necessary if they were to become good navy men —"grow web feet," as they put it. It was for this reason that, about a month after the section was organized, Rear Admiral Wood appointed Rear Admiral Rogers, also commandant of the naval units at Harvard, Technology, and Tufts, to the command of the section at Boston University. Admiral Rogers at once appointed two ensigns, R. T. Jackson and E. R. Clark, the former a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, the latter a former student at the College of Business Administration of Boston University, to the immediate command of the section. The appointment of these naval officers raised the section to the rank of a unit.

Never were two officers more enthusiastically received by the men under their command than Ensigns Jackson and Clark. The men felt that they were really in the navy now; they swept down "decks" instead of "floors," and "gangways" instead of "stairs." The "barracks" became the U. S. S. Newbury. Classes aboard ship were formed for training in semaphore and wig-wag signaling and in marlinespike seamanship, under the instruction of the ensigns and petty officers. The kindness of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity furnished the lower deck as a commodious and comfortable study and recreation room, the boys "chipped in" and hired a player-piano, and social life aboard ship took on a new meaning.

The influenza epidemic had delayed the beginning of school work for the naval men, as it had for the army men. When classes finally began, the men were helped to arrange their courses according to the branch of naval service in which they were most interested. Their choice was about evenly divided between "line" and "paymaster." Those preparing for the schools for line ensigns studied trigonometry, elementary navigation, physics, English, and a foreign language. Those who by age and because of sea duty already performed would be eligible for the ensign schools to begin in January were permitted to study nautical astronomy. The men who were interested in the paymaster corps studied such subjects as economics, accounting, transportation, English, and a foreign language. The regular S. A. T. C. course in War Issues was required of all. The apprentice seamen were required to study their "Blue Jacket's Manuals" and to take weekly quizzes. These studies were in addition to the training given in signaling and seamanship.

The signing of the armistice in mid-November found the naval unit in full stride, an efficient, well-drilled, and well-disciplined body. And then came the order for demobilization.

The Navy Department decided to continue the line ensign schools for one more term of two months, beginning in January. In the Boston University Naval Unit were nine men who were of the required age and who had the necessary sea service, with training at Bumkin Island and at the naval rifle range at Wakefield. These nine men were permitted to take the entrance examinations for the ensign schools. Eight of the nine passed, with seven of the eight ranked in the first hundred of the more than two hundred and fifty men who took the examinations. One, however, failed to meet the physical requirements, and so seven men from the Boston University Naval Unit were admitted to the last ensign schools, one going to Pelham Bay and six to Cambridge. Of these seven, six won their commissions as ensigns, one obtaining his release from service during the school term.

At a dinner at the Hotel Brunswick after demobilization the members of the unit effected a permanent organization as the Boston University Naval Unit, electing Ensign Jackson, president, Ensign Clark, treasurer, and Professor Center, secretary.

CAPTAIN HERBERT F. HARTWELL

HERBERT F. HARTWELL

HERBERT F. HARTWELL, '03, College of Liberal Arts, received high honors for distinguished gallantry during the war. Captain Hartwell, formerly of the 104th Infantry, 26th Division, was one of the very few American officers of junior rank who won the coveted decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honor of France, the highest honor awarded by the French Republic. General de Buyer proposed Captain Hartwell for Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. The award was in recognition of Captain Hartwell's "signal services as a Liaison Officer" with the French Army.

When the Cross of the Legion of Honor decoration was conferred at Nancy one battalion of troops from the Iron Division, which was the 26th Division of the French Army, and one battalion from the 39th French Division of the 20th C. A. turned out in his honor. Besides the citation accompanying the French decoration, Captain Hartwell has personal citations from the French Generals de Buyer and Paulinier, and also from General Edwards of the 26th Division, Colonel, afterward General, George H. Shelton, 104th Infantry, Colonel Henry H. Harjes, Chief of the Liaison Service. While doing the liaison work Captain Hartwell was attached to the headquarters of the 20th French Army Corps. Captain Hartwell was decorated for bravery in action with the Croix de Guerre with gold star on recommendation of Maréchal Pétain, Commander-in-Chief of the French Armies, with the following citation:

P. C.
Grande Quartier Général des Armées Françaises de l'Est — Ordre No. 17. 710 "D" (Extrait)

Etat-Major. Capitaine H. F. HARTWELL, 104e R. I. U. S.;

"Un avion allemand de bombardement se dirigeant sur Paris "dans la nuit du 11 au 12 Mars 1918 ayant été contraint d'atterrir "dans nos lignes, s'est élancé à la poursuite des aviateurs ennemis "cherchant à fuir à la faveur de la nuit et les fit prisonniers.

Le Maréchal de France
Commandant en chef les Armées Françaises de l'Est Pétain.

Captain Hartwell saw a German Gotha land at night and made a rush for the crew. He captured the two aces, with the sergeant major, and took them to the nearest American headquarters. These were the first German aviators captured by the A. E. F.

SPECIAL WORK IN MATHEMATICS FOR THE S. A. T. C.

Robert E. Bruce

[Professor R. E. Bruce is head of the Department of Mathematics in the College of Liberal Arts of Boston University.]

THREE courses given by the Department of Mathematics were required in one or another of the S. A. T. C. programs; viz., plane trigonometry, surveying, and navigation. The registration in navigation was not large, as not many men elected the program for which it was required. In the course in trigonometry there were nine divisions. The course in surveying had an enrolment of over one hundred. The following members of the faculty assisted the members of the department in the work of instruction: Professors A. W. Weysse, N. A. Kent, W. G. Aurelio, Messrs. J. R. Martin, and L. B. Taylor. The following teachers from other institutions assisted: Mr. J. A. Marsh, English High School, Boston; Mr. Paul Norton, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Most valuable aid was given by Mr. Ernest W. Branch, A.B. '88, who, in spite of heavy work in his own office, due to a large government contract, gave eight hours per week as supervisor of field work in surveying.

WAR WORK OF THE COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS

THE war work of the College of Liberal Arts may best be divided into three parts: the preparedness period, and the two college years during which the country was actually at war.

On March 23, 1917, Dean Warren appointed a "Faculty Committee on Preparedness," consisting of Professors C. P. Huse, N. A. Kent, and S. M. Waxman. Under the auspices of this committee, a preparedness meeting was held on April 2, 1917. After President Murlin had given an introductory address, Mrs. James J. Storrow, President of the Women's City Club of Boston, and Colonel Frank L. Locke, of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, outlined the fields of activities which young men and young women, respectively, could enter. Dr. Waxman gave a short talk on the Corps Cadets. Miss Esther M. Nazarian, '17, presented to the college a large flag, purchased by the Girls' Glee Club with the proceeds of its 1917 concert, and Dean Warren suitably acknowledged the gift. Resolutions were then passed pledging the support of the student body to the war program of the Government. The meeting closed with the singing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

On April 11 a second assembly was held. Dean Warren presided, and addresses were given by the following: Miss Mary F. Stratton, Secretary-Treasurer of the Boston School of Physical Education, on "Reconstruction Work;" Miss Edna Cutter, of the New England Branch of the Woman's National Farm and Garden Association, on "Farm Work for Women During the Summer;" and Miss Mabel G. Curtis on the details of registration for farm work. Announcements were made by Mr. Frank Kingdon, '20. Singing, directed by Professor H. Augustine Smith, closed the meeting. Lists of war activities open to men, and of summer activities suitable for men and women, were shortly after prepared and posted. Classes were quickly formed for Red Cross and First Aid work. There were enrolled a total of 145 students from the College of Liberal Arts; 10 also entered from the College of Business Administration. The various groups were directed by six physicians from our Medical School, who volunteered their assistance.

In the early fall of 1917, our country being actually at war, the name "Faculty Committee on Preparedness" was changed to "War Time Activities Committee." That a closer connection might exist between the Faculty Committee and the student body, there was formed on October 17 a "Liberty Committee," composed of two representatives, a man and a woman, from each of the four classes of the college, with, in addition, other prominent students. The members of this committee were: Frank Kingdon, '20, Alice Springfield, '18, Shields Warren, '18, Margaret H. Thompson, '19, Warren H. Wardle, '19, Esther V. Thurston, '20, Rudolph Bennitt, '20, Mary S. Mills, '21, Norman M. Martin, Elsie M. Woodland, '18, Ursula M. Cronin, '20; also Miss Rachel Hardwick and Professor Norton A. Kent. The Faculty Committee on War Time Activities was further strengthened by the addition of Miss Rachel Hardwick, and student and faculty committees alike entered energetically upon the second period of their war work. Special courses in the Chemistry of Foods and on Hygiene for trained attendants, and a new course in Navigation were offered at the College of Liberal Arts. Each noon representatives from the Department of French in the College of Liberal Arts lunched with army officers situated in near-by armories, in order to instruct and drill them in the use of the French language.

On November 1 Brewer Eddy addressed the students, giving his famous talk, "In the War Camps at Home and Overseas." This meeting netted over $120, and the proceeds were used to buy yarn, which the young women of the college knitted into sweaters for the men at the front. The first great Young Men's Christian Association campaign, known in the colleges as the Students' Friendship War Fund Campaign, then followed. The friendship idea appealed strongly to the student body, and the campaign made a deep impression. The college pledged $1,290.20. Every cent of this pledge was paid. The class of 1920 bought a Series II Liberty Bond and presented it to the College Library.

November 23 the Liberty Committee was affiliated with the Student Council.

On December 13 a food conservation rally was held. Dr. Lyman C. Newell spoke on the subject, "How We Can Help Win the War by Conserving Food." There were placed on exhibition plastic models loaned by the courtesy of the Plastic Novelty and Specialty Company, of New York, and of their agents in Boston, the F. H. Thomas Co. There were also displayed certain charts and photographs dealing with food conservation.

The December Red Cross Campaign brought in 94 new members from the college.

December 17 it was voted that the Student Council and Liberty Committee combine under the name of "The War Council."

On February 7, 1918, a play was given by the students for the benefit of the Cercle Français. This netted $125.00.

In March and April over 400 books were collected for the Soldiers' Library.

In May $52 was sent to one of our graduates, William C. Poole, S.T.B. '17, doing Y. M. C. A. work in London. This money was used for the benefit of our American soldiers passing through that city.

During the college year our young women knitted for the men in the service a total of 41 sweaters.

In February two assemblies were held, one addressed by Mr. William Howland, who had been in the Ambulance Corps in France and is now a teacher in Emerson College. His lantern slides of the war zone in France brought vividly to the audience the almost irreparable devastation. At the other assembly Professor Thomas N. Carver, of Harvard University, spoke on "The Liquor Problem in War Time."

During the latter part of the second semester, the "Woman on the Land" movement was urged. Reports were compiled on work and wages for men in factories.

In the closing weeks of the second semester a campaign was launched to place men and women in patriotic work during the summer months — on the farms, or in ship-building or munition plants.

The faculty and student committees assisted, to a small extent, in the Navy League campaign, the Provincetown Hostess House enterprise, and a campaign undertaken by the College of Business Administration to obtain money for comfort bags for its men at the front.

The majority of college assemblies held on Thursday were directed by the combined faculty and student committees.

The college year 1918-19 may be said to comprise the third period of our activity. The most important development this year was the formation of the War Service Union. The Faculty Committee on War Time Activities and the War Council combined in the formation of the War Service Union. This organization had a two-fold object: (1) To organize the student body so that every ounce of energy should be consecrated to the national task; (2) to maintain a clearing-house for all student activities connected with the war, to provide a recognized authority for the sanctioning of such activities, and to mass behind all sanctioned efforts the forces of the War Service Union. The organization of the Union was as follows:

During this year the presence of the S.A.T.C. and the Naval Unit greatly complicated the life of the college; but despite these difficulties, the year was one of marked activity, and substantial results were obtained. The important events of the year were as follows:

On November 1 an organization meeting, addressed by the Chief Executive, Frank Kingdon, was held in Jacob Sleeper Hall.

On November 13, in the Old South Church, a great assembly was convened. The chief speaker was Brewer Eddy, who spoke on "With the Red Triangle on Four Fronts." The meeting was not only a War Service Union assembly but the opening of the University drive for the United War Work Fund. There were in attendance the President of the University, the Deans of the various departments, members of the faculties, the civilian students, and the 825 members of the Students' Army Training Corps and Naval Unit, who entered the auditorium in a body.

This special war drive was ably conducted in the various departments by the following persons: S.A.T.C. and Naval Unit, Louis Stone, in coöperation with Lieut. Arthur H. Wehle; College of Liberal Arts, Miss Marion A. Wheeler, '20; College of Business Administration, Mr. Emery T. Dyer; Department of Education, Miss Ruth Olive Halford; Law School, Miss Mary F. Downey, '20, and Mr. Deane C. Davis, '21; Medical School, Miss Eleanor B. Ferguson, '20; Theological School, Mr. William M. Taylor, '19. In addition to the above, several instructors assisted in the canvass. Local rallies were held in different departments of the University, and in the College of Liberal Arts an auction of war drive posters was held.

Some urgent war needs necessarily ceased with the signing of the armistice, but the amount of money pledged by the College of Liberal Arts to the United War Work Fund, $2,198.31, has not only been fully paid, but the amount received to date has reached the figure $2,209.61, and is still growing.

The most interesting, possibly the most exciting, meeting of the year was that of November 11, 1918. It was an impromptu Victory Celebration. Mr. Frank Kingdon led the cheering. President Murlin, Dean Warren, Mrs. E. Charlton Black, and Mr. Kingdon were among the speakers. Professor Waxman led the students in singing the "Marseillaise." Patriotic songs were sung. Class exercises were suspended for the day.

At the assembly meeting of December 5, excerpts from letters received from our men at the front were read.

February 20 a mass meeting was held, the subject being the "League of Nations." A stirring address was delivered by Mr. Kingdon.

Miss Marion Bradford, '19, in a careful and exhaustive report, gives the following figures regarding the Red Cross work of the college during the year 1918-19: The Red Cross membership reached 182 in the college, while those joining at home were 148, making a total of 330; two magazine subscriptions were obtained during the year; 57 men's sweaters, 87 pairs of men's socks, 90 children's sweaters, and 46 pairs of children's socks were knitted by our young women; 1,377 comfort kits were filled, rolled, placed in bags, and packed ready for shipment; eight volunteer workers helped in the house-to-house canvass for the Boston Dispensary; several young women served in the Home Service Section of the American Red Cross, doing clerical work in the city; and $87 was collected for the Public Welfare Campaign.

Of certain other committees the following reports are submitted:

Miss Clara V. Sargent, '19, states for the War Literature Committee that no demand was made on the committee until the call for books in December for the debarkation stations and hospitals. An individual canvass of all students was then taken, but owing to previous demands only seventy books were received. A large box of magazines was received from a member of the faculty. All were taken to headquarters at the Boston Public Library.

In March a large number of war information pamphlets were distributed among the students through the various study rooms.

For the Publicity Committee Miss Dorothy S. Smyth, '19, states that posters and notices were provided for all assemblies. Summer work report cards were distributed and collected, and the Victory Loan Campaign was pushed with vigor. An incomplete poll of faculty and students indicated that about $10,000 was probably the total of subscriptions, about $2,500 being from the student body.

Among the other activities of the War Service Union may be enumerated the War Service Union Membership Fee Campaign, which netted $20.50 in the College of Liberal Arts and $8.50 in the College of Business Administration; Italian Tag Day, on which a small sum of money was raised; an extensive campaign, conducted by Miss Dorothy S. Smyth, '19, the object being to ascertain the nature and extent of patriotic work, remunerative or non-remunerative, performed by our students during the summer of 1918.

The Faculty Committee on War Time Activities has at present writing, upon its list of those who have served their country in this war, a total of 126 men and 10 women. During the preparedness and war periods, five circular letters were sent to our men and women in the service, and many interesting replies were received.

The committee wishes to express its deep appreciation of all that the students have done to bring to completion the great success of these periods of war activity. To mention all who served would be impossible; the lists would well-nigh be a counterpart of the catalogues of students in the various college classes. Much painstaking and loyal work has been done by the chairmen of both regular and special committees, and the officers of the Liberty Committee, the War Council and War Service Union, the secretaries, Miss Margaret H. Thompson, '19, and Miss Mary A. Rowan, '19, especially bearing a heavy burden of work.

The Faculty Committee owes a debt of gratitude to Miss Hilda S. Murray, '20, for her faithful and skilful services as secretary, and to Miss Edith N. Snow, '20, for the preparation of a card index of our men and women in service. In closing we cannot express too strongly our obligation to Mr. Frank Kingdon, whose whole-hearted enthusiasm, able leadership, and fruitful service have meant so much to both the faculty and the students during those recent strenuous but victorious months.

WAR ACTIVITIES OF THE SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

WHEN America entered the war the student body was called together and given the world challenge. In a sense it came to the ministers as to no other class or individual. The cause was so deeply one of righteousness and civilization that it seemed to the leaders of the school that it would be difficult for any one of military age to preach righteousness and not be willing in such a world crisis to fight, and if need be die, for it, as did He whose life is the preacher's theme. Pacifism, and a totally emasculate interpretation of the gospel, had, it was discovered, found lodgment in a few individuals of the student body, largely through influences not now in the school. But as the great cause loomed larger and vision became clearer, these practically all saw the error of a judgment as mistaken as it was sincere, and the response to the world call was not less than remarkable. The school gave as large a proportion as has been heard of in any institution or department, though the minister was by law exempt from service. No effort was made to secure students for the following year. All were told they should enter the service if possible. The entering class of 1918 was therefore but 17.

Each war loan was taken up by the student body and liberally subscribed for, as was each drive by welfare organizations, the students out of meager means reaching remarkable totals.

Most of the students attending the school during the war were regular pastors of churches, and did much to raise the patriotic morale of their people.

Great speakers were constantly brought to the school to give the highest interpretation of the world crisis to those who in their turn carried it to their people.

Those remaining in the school were largely the more mature men with families, and practically all of these were ready at any time to go when the need was imperative.

WAR ACTIVITIES OF THE SCHOOL OF LAW

APRIL 19, 1918, was known as Tribute Day at the School of Law. The students of the school, with a number from outside, met in the large lecture hall, where a United States flag and portraits of President Wilson and Governor McCall, and a volume containing the portraits of the Law School men who were in the national service, were presented to the school by the three classes. The Law School members of the Boston University Battalion, which was in camp at Lexington during the holiday, came back to Boston for the exercises, and returned to camp at noon.

Dean Albers introduced Reverend Father Lyons, president of Boston College, who opened the exercises with prayer. Almost immediately Honorable Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, arrived. He was accompanied by Mayor Peters, of the City of Boston, Rear-Admiral Spencer S. Wood, in charge of the first naval district, Lieutenant-Commander Carter, personal aide to the secretary, and Commandant Rush and officers from the navy yard. Secretary Daniels, as reported by the University News, April 23, 1918, said in part:

"It is well that exercises on such a day as this and on such an occasion should be begun by asking the divine blessing, for we have come to realize, in this tremendous period in the world's history through which we are passing, that religion and patriotism are inseparable, now and forever.

"I love to look into the faces of these young men — but there are no old men now. Men with years of life and experience behind them have been touched by a new spirit, and old men have become young.

"We have no old men in the navy. All men in the navy are young. That is because they daily come into direct and personal contact with youth. The navy is an institution of youth. When the great fleet of American war vessels made its famous trip around the world, the average age of the men in the fleet was twenty years. Not the age of the enlisted men, you understand. The average included that great sea warrior, Fighting Bob Evans, and it included all the officers."

Secretary Daniels paid a tribute to the spirit of the navy in war time. "But everywhere I go," he said, "I find the same spirit among all Americans. There is no place in America for any man who lacks faith in the eternal success of the principles for which we are fighting.

"Whenever I look at the flag," Secretary Daniels said, as he brought his remarks to a close, "I think of the tribute to our national emblem spoken by the most distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, I believe, since Daniel Webster — the late Senator Hoar." The Secretary quoted the eloquent words, to the effect that the most beautiful sight in the world was the sight of the flag of one's country in a foreign land. "Unfortunately," said Secretary Daniels, "Senator Hoar did not in his time see that sight so often as it could have been seen a generation before; he did not see it so frequently as travelers over the world shall see it in the days that are to come."

Dean Albers introduced Mr. Charles W. Lyons, of the class of 1919, who presented to the school the portrait of President Wilson. Professor Chandler M. Wood accepted the portrait and said:

"At every time of great stress in our country's history she has been vouchsafed a great leader to give voice to the nation's highest aspirations. In the day of the foundation of the Republic, it was Washington; in the dark day of sectional division, it was Abraham Lincoln; in this great day, when our country has entered into the world's greatest war in order that the world may be a safe place to live in, it is Woodrow Wilson, who not only voices the aspirations of America, but is even the spokesman for the democracies of the world.

"It is peculiarly appropriate that the portrait of President Wilson should hang upon the walls of this Law School, where men are necessarily imbibing the principles upon which our common law is founded. The position of President Wilson in history is made definite and clear by the demand he is making upon the world that the moral principles which govern the relations between individuals shall be applied to international laws and conduct.

"President Wilson is the spokesman for the democracies of the world; he will again be the spokesman for the free nations of the world when world policies are to be decided at the end of the war."

Mr. Lot McNamara, Jr., of the class of 1920, then presented the portrait of Governor McCall. Professor Harold M. Bowman accepted the portrait as the gift of the school and paid a tribute to the governor.

Mr. Fernand Despins, vice-president of the class of 1918, then presented the book of portraits of the Law School men who are in the national service. Professor Frank Leslie Simpson accepted the gift.

Governor McCall arrived at this part of the exercises. Dean Albers, in introducing Governor McCall, announced as the governor's topic, "The Flag." Governor McCall said in part:

"I was much impressed by the flag I saw over the door of this building as I entered — a flag with as many stars in its field as there are in the Milky Way. That is a more eloquent tribute to the flag than I could possibly pay, that tribute of the young men who have gone out from this great University into the service of their country to uphold the honor of that flag and the principles for which it stands.

"It is a beautiful flag, but it is made beautiful because it stands for liberty and right and justice and government by law. If it stood for tyranny, oppression, and injustice, it would be a hideous thing, no matter how beautiful it might be merely as a thing to look at.

"Especially the flag stands for government by law. In times like these, when the newspapers are telling us so much that is true, and so much, I am afraid, that is not quite so true, it is well to remember that. A nation is apt to become hysterical. We want to be careful about that. We want to see that nothing happens that we shall be ashamed of and sorry for after the war is over."

Governor McCall spoke of acts of violence against alien enemies — even lynchings in some of our States. "There is one thing about lynching," he said; "it is illegal; it is brutal; but more than all that, it is cowardly. It is usually one unarmed man against many who are armed. When a thing like that is done, it sullies and tarnishes the heroism of our men in the field.

"We are in the war to a finish,— a glorious finish,— but we want to keep ourselves right at home, so that when peace comes it will honor us. We want to turn the world into a world which is governed by law; a world where the strong cannot trample the weak; where relations between nations shall be governed by the same principles that govern relations between individuals; where nations must submit their differences to a court.

"We are battling against an iniquitous system which has existed from the beginning of time, and has for centuries sacrificed the flower of our youth upon the altars of the god of war. If we can put an end to that, our sacrifices will have been worth while."

Mr. Edward Clayton Mathewson, president of the class of 1918, in presenting the flag to the school, said:

"Mr. President, Dean Albers, and Faculty of Boston University School of Law: Many of the men of Boston University School of Law have answered the call to service in the World War. They have gone out to effect the realization of our ideals of justice and humanity and liberty, to guarantee to each nation the right to determine for itself the character of government under which it shall live, and to establish those same ideals for which one-half the world is fighting to-day,— the ideals of human freedom.

"Perhaps Boston University is the first educational institution to take steps to perpetuate the records of the loyalty of her fighting sons and to seek to honor them during their lives, in appreciation of their patriotism, rather than at a later time when they have won distinction or that oblivion which disregards distinction and is insensible to honor or to praise; for it is our belief that when a man has joined the colors he has thereby proved his patriotism, and that the rest is largely a matter of opportunity or event. Many a potential hero goes through years of service, faithfully performing the duties assigned to him without opportunity to display the mettle he is made of, while another, in the rush of battle, may, under the eye of one who lives to tell the tale, do some brilliant and spectacular deed that wins immortal fame or signal honor.

"At least one of our students has been cited for bravery. We honor him. No less, however, do we honor his comrades to whom has not yet been offered the opportunity for the conspicuous manifestation of that bravery which all of them really possess.

"Loyalty and patriotism are as truly indicated by the entry into the service — by this offer of life on the country's altar — as by any specific exhibition of courage. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his country.'

"Before they joined the colors these men sat here in this lecture hall, some of them with us as classmates. We were with these men when this great cause of freedom called them — when the appeal became so strong that they placed their loyalty to this cause and to their country above all personal aspirations, and above the ties of home and friends. Of our admiration for the patriotism and loyalty of our men the idea was born in the hearts of the class of 1918 to honor, during their lives, every one of our University men who is in this World War.

"To commemorate such service, so unselfishly given for the cause of democracy, for the principles of free government established in the time of Washington, welded together under the hand of Lincoln, and furthered by the sacrifices of our countrymen under McKinley to free the land of Cuba and give it back to her people, so that they might live under the character of government determined for themselves, and now sought by President Wilson to be extended to the peoples of all nations, there can be no more suitable token than the emblem which represents the call that overcomes a man's wavering between his loyalty to his country and the ties of home, and which symbolizes all the suspense of those who remain at home and await the safe return of their men, and the fortitude with which fathers, mothers, wives, sisters, and brothers bear the heartaches and the sorrows of the waiting, and the greater sorrow which comes with the news that the life which is so dear to them has been given as the greatest sacrifice that one can make for his country.

"This emblem, our flag, we present to you in honor of these men of our University."

Dean Albers, accepting the flag, spoke as follows:

"This school has furnished to this Commonwealth three of its governors,— William E. Russell, John L. Bates, and David I. Walsh. The chief justice and a majority of the justices of the highest court in this Commonwealth, many of the judges of the Superior Court, still more of the inferior courts, the present attorney-general, many congressmen and legislators, received their legal education here.

"Nor is Massachusetts alone of our States indebted to this school for able officers. Governors, judges, attorney-generals, congressmen from adjoining States, the Middle West, and the Pacific Slope, studied law here. Federal judges — in this circuit, in the North and East, to Florida in the South, the Philippines and Manila in the Far West, or Far East — came from here; so that we could truly paraphrase the British boast and say that the sun never sets upon the scales of justice held by the judicial hands of the graduates of this school. We are justly proud of this record.

"Within the last few years the standard of scholarship for admission and for graduation has been raised, but notwithstanding this elevation, there has been, until this year, a great increase in the number of students. We took pride in this elevation in the standard of legal education, and in the increase in numbers and prosperity of the school.

"Then came the war, and our numbers faded away. Over forty former members of this year's senior class have been called to the colors — nearly as many as the total graduating class of 1911. Our pride in this decrease is even greater than was our pride because of the increase. We glory in the departure of our comrades. They have gone to serve their school in a higher plane; their have gone to serve their country; they have gone in order that the flag may be unsullied and unconquered. We do well to remember them; we honor ourselves in honoring them.

> " 'Breathes there a man with soul so dead
> Who never to himself hath said:
> "This is my own, my native land!" '

"Therefore, members of the senior class, in behalf of the school and of the University, with gratitude and with pride, I accept this flag. I thank you for the flag itself, its texture and its beauty. It is possible that loving prejudice or partiality may affect our judgment, but it seems to me that ours is the most beautiful flag of any in the world.

"I thank you also for the spirit of loyalty and the sentiment towards the school which you have hereby shown; and even still more do I thank you for the loyalty and the sentiment towards our country which this gift evinces. Your gift and the flag itself symbolize patriotism, willingness to sacrifice, wholehearted devotion to our country. The flag is beautiful, but the ideals which it represents are transcendent.

"No one of us can behold it without a deep feeling of responsibility to higher than earthly ideals. In the words of a western American: 'The true American patriot is ever a worshiper; that starry symbol of his country's sovereignty is to him radiant with a diviner glory than that which meets his mortal vision. It epitomizes the splendid results of dreary ages of experiments and failures in human government, and as he gazes upon its starry folds, undulating responsive to the whispering winds of the upper air, it sometimes seems to his rapt spirit to recede farther and still farther into the soft blue sky, until the very heavens open, and angel hands plant it on the battlements of Paradise.' "

President Murlin then pronounced the benediction. During the exercises Miss Leveroni sang the "Marseillaise," the Italian Anthem, Garibaldi's Hymn, and the "Star-Spangled Banner."

At a meeting of the students of the School of Law held in December, 1917, Mr. Edward Clayton Mathewson, president of the class of 1918, gave an address on "Loyalty." This meeting was preparatory to "Tribute Day." A copy of this address was sent to every Law School man in the national service. Mr. Mathewson was very enthusiastic in his war activities. He enlisted in April, 1917, but though rejected on May 30 of that year, made other attempts to get into active service, but was not accepted.

Each of the classes 1918, 1919, and 1920 purchased a Liberty Bond. The three classes raised a fund and sent a Christmas box to each member of the school who was in service in December, 1917.

WAR ACTIVITIES OF THE SCHOOL OF MEDICINE

John P. Sutherland

[Dr. John P. Sutherland is Dean of the School of Medicine of Boston University.]

DURING the war the Medical Department was busy in various ways, but did not hold any rallies or special meetings.

The members of the faculty subscribed to both the Fourth and Fifth Liberty Loans.

All of the eligible students of the school were inducted into the service as members of the Medical Enlisted Reserve Corps, and later were inducted into the Students' Army Training Corps.

The members of the faculty served on Draft Boards and Medical Examination Boards, and a number saw active service.

The members of the faculty subscribed at least $46,400 to the Fourth Liberty Loan.

During the war the School of Medicine took care of 1,215 soldiers and sailors in the Hospital and West Department, Brighton, and 172 at the Nash House.

Base Hospital No. 44 was organized in the summer of 1917 and called to the service March 10, 1918.

WAR RELIEF WORK OF THE BOSTON UNIVERSITY WOMEN GRADUATES' CLUB

Pauline Nelson Hartstone

[Mrs. Pauline Nelson Hartstone, a graduate of the School of Law of Boston University, '05, was president of the Boston University Women Graduates' Club.]

IN April, 1917, a meeting was held to consider war work. One member of the faculty from each department of Boston University was invited to tell of the work being done by his department. At this meeting it was decided to coöperate with Boston University in every possible way, and the president of the club was delegated to confer with President Murlin and offer the club's services.

The policies and character of the club's work immediately changed: each meeting was centered about war work, and men and women of prominence gave talks on this all-absorbing subject.

All receipts from readings and entertainments were added to the war fund to be used solely for war work and war benevolences.

A largely attended public patriotic rally, under the auspices of the Women Graduates' Club and arranged entirely by them, was held in Jacob Sleeper Hall, March 8, 1918, with speakers from all departments of the University, to tell the public "What Boston University Is Doing in the War."

One of the first war activities was to help the College Women's Hospitality Center at Provincetown for the benefit of men in the coast-patrol service. Women of various colleges undertook this work under the direction of Mrs. Percy G. Bolster, of the Boston University Women Graduates' Club. Besides aiding financially, several members of the club served as hostesses.

Miss Mary K. Taylor, A.B. '10, a member of the club, was sent abroad as its representative for social service work in France. A report of her efficient work is to be published within a short time.

Substantial financial aid and encouragement were given Mrs. Waxman, wife of Professor Samuel M. Waxman, of Boston University, and her committee, who have maintained for nearly four years a rest house for French soldiers in Paris known as L'Œuvre des Petits Blessés, Fondation des Cercle Français de l'Université de Boston.

The Boston University Women Graduates' Club helped to keep "open house" for the social life of the Students' Army Training Corps.

The American Red Cross at Washington, D.C., was helped by the club in its effort to secure college women to go abroad as nurses, aids, and assistants under its direction.

The local Red Cross and Special Aid Societies were materially helped by contributions by individual members of money and clothing, canteen work, and motor transportation.

The Government was aided by members speaking for liberty loans and selling bonds, and by the work of members who served on the legal advisory board.

The Massachusetts Board of Food Administration appealed to the Boston Branch of the Association of Collegiate Alumnæ to undertake the work of retail price-reporting, known as a piece of war emergency work; and to the Boston University Women Graduates' Club was assigned the large district comprising Jamaica Plain, Hyde Park, Roslindale, Mattapan, and West Roxbury.

The last notable club action was a contribution of money toward the maintenance and support of a French girl at Boston University, and an additional sum to close the work of the L'Œuvre des Petits Blessés.

Contributions amounting to five hundred dollars were distributed by the club among the various war benevolences.

Special mention must be made of Mrs. Herbert D. Boyd, under whose able direction and leadership this big work was accomplished.

COLONEL LEONARD P. AYRES

LEONARD P. AYRES

ONE of the members of the Presidential Peace Party was Colonel Leonard P. Ayers of the General Staff of the Army. He made the trip in the capacity of Chief Statistical Officer of the Presidential Party.

At the outbreak of the war Colonel Ayres went to Washington and urged the organization of a statistical service which should furnish those in positions of top control with a fact basis for thinking and acting. He tendered not only his own services, but those of the Statistical and Educational Divisions of the Russell Sage Foundation, of which he was at that time director. The offer was accepted and Colonel Ayres became the Director of the Division of Statistics of the Council of National Defense. As the work expanded he organized and became Director of the Division of Statistics of the War Industries Board, the Priorities Committee, and the Allies' Purchasing Commission.

These services involved work which was so confidential in nature that it was decided to incorporate in the War Department those portions dealing with strictly military information. The Director was commissioned as Lieutenant Colonel in the Army while his assistants were taken into other ranks of the commissioned service. Colonel Ayres was then appointed Chief Statistical Officer of the General Staff, and his office prepared weekly secret reports for the President, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the generals in charge of the different divisions of the Army. He also organized and conducted the service by which the Department transmitted each week to the military committees of the House and Senate the salient information regarding the progress of the war.

The news of the value of this work to the Administration in America reached the ears of General Pershing, who cabled over asking that similar services be organized for him in France, and Colonel Ayres was sent over at the head of a selected body of officers and statistical assistants to undertake the work. In France he was stationed at General Pershing's headquarters and organized the services of statistical information for both the General Headquarters in the zone of the advance and the Supply Services behind the advanced zone.

During the summer he represented the United States Army in joint conference held by the Supreme War Council at Versailles to determine what sorts of information should be exchanged among the Allied governments and the United States. Later he was present at the Shipping Conference in London by which this country borrowed British ships for moving our Army and its supplies.

He returned to this country in October after having been present at the battle of St. Mihiel and seeing active service at other points in the Front. Upon his return he was promoted to be a full Colonel, made Chief of the Statistics Branch of the General Staff, and made a member of the General Staff.

In his published report the Secretary of War announced that the services which Colonel Ayres has organized will be retained as a permanent part of our Army organization.

THE DIVISION OF STATISTICS

Leonard Porter Ayres

[Colonel Leonard Porter Ayres, College of Liberal Arts, '02, was Chief Statistical Officer of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, Paris, December, 1918, to May, 1919.]

IN the winter of 1901, Professor W. M. Warren labored to induct the writer into a comprehension of the nature of knowledge. He said that there were two elements in knowledge, namely, truths and facts. He further distinguished between the different classes of facts, pointing out that some of them were essential, while others were only incidental.

Early in the winter of 1917 the writer conferred with his associates in regard to these principles. He argued that there was every indication that we were going to declare war on Germany, and that when this happened the Government at Washington would find that it needed to have at its disposal facts with regard to America's resources. He further argued that some one who had been inducted by Professor Warren into a comprehension of the nature of knowledge should forthwith go to Washington to impress upon the authorities there the necessity of creating an organization to make the facts available. This organization should sort the facts out into the essential ones and the incidental ones, and present the essential facts to those in positions of top control, in order that they might use them as the raw material for making decisions.

The associates to whom these arguments were presented were not favorably impressed. Nevertheless, the writer went to Washington and presented his arguments to influential persons in the Government service. These dignitaries were not favorably impressed either. In the first place, they would not admit that there was going to be any war; in the second place, they did not think it would be necessary to have a special agency to collect the facts; and in the third place, they had never studied psychology under Professor Warren, and would not admit the validity of his categories.

Nevertheless, the war came, and the writer went back to Washington and insisted on establishing his office for the collection and dissemination of essential facts. This office became the Division of Statistics of the Council of National Defense, and devoted itself to finding out what kind of essential facts the people who were running the war needed to know. In military operations an essential fact is known as a controlling factor, and it soon developed that the controlling factor in the raising of our new army was wool breeches.

The first serious statistical work the office had to do was to produce an authoritative statement as to how soon the United States could produce a sufficient number of wool breeches to make it possible to issue the first draft call. Some army officers and some manufacturers claimed that they could be ready in July. Others insisted that they could not be provided before December. Meanwhile, no final decisions could be made with regard to calling the men until some one could furnish the essential facts with regard to wool breeches.

This piece of work led to others. The next controlling factor turned out to be shipping. How many ships were there? How many men could they carry? How fast could they make their round trips? How many pounds of food and munitions does each soldier consume each day, and how many tons of cargo shipping would be required to carry the material? All these questions had to be answered by the new office, and soon it became evident that there was a place for a military "fact-office" in the running of the war.

During the summer of 1917 the Division of Statistics began issuing weekly secret reports for the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, telling what progress was being made in mobilizing men, manufacturing munitions, and shipping troops overseas. These reports were mostly made up of simple diagrams, and their outstanding characteristic was that they dealt only with the essential facts, and omitted the incidental ones. Early in 1918 this work had grown to such dimensions and its output had become so confidential in nature that the army authorities decided to incorporate the organization as part of the regular military establishment.

The offices were transferred to the War Department building and a number of the workers were commissioned as army officers. The writer was among these, and became a lieutenant-colonel in the National Army. From this time on the work increased rapidly in scope as those directing the military policies of the country increasingly realized the necessity for accurate information. As the Statistics Branch of the General Staff, the office continued to make reports each week on the progress of our war preparations. These reports were for the personal use of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff. Another and still more highly secret report was made each week to the President, and it is interesting to note that this report was in part patterned after the one made each week for King George by the British Army Intelligence Service in England.

Besides relying upon the Statistics Branch for these weekly reports, the War Department turned over to it the work of classifying the confidential information and transmitting portions of it to certain men who had to take action and make decisions. These men had to have a fact-basis for their thinking and acting. The work was done by means of statistical lectures given by the writer. During 1918 five of these lectures were given each week. On Monday morning there was one before the War Council, at which all the latest facts with regard to men, munitions, and supplies were shown by a series of simple wall charts. On Monday noon much the same information was given to a group consisting of the brigadier and major-generals in command of the different divisions and bureaus of the War Department. On Wednesday all the facts with regard to shipments of men and supplies were set before a meeting known as the Maritime Conference, which included such men as the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Hoover, Mr. Hurley, Mr. Schwab, Mr. Baruch, General Goethals, and others charged with the responsibility of getting the men and materials to France. Each Friday a general summary of the military situation was presented to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and each Saturday similar material was given to the House Committee on Military Affairs. These weekly lectures were continued regularly until after the signing of the armistice.

They were not, however, given by the writer during this entire time, for in the spring there came a cablegram from General Pershing asking to have established at his headquarters in France a statistical service similar to the one in Washington, of which rumors had reached him. Receipt of this cable was followed by some weeks of great activity. Officers of statistical experience were located in different organizations of the army and ordered to report at Washington for overseas service. A school for these officers was organized and an intensive course in military statistics given to all candidates for the new work. Finally, at the end of May, Statistics Unit A, under command of the writer, left Washington for France, where it duly arrived some weeks later.

General Pershing proved to be like Secretary Baker in that he wanted only the essential facts, but, nevertheless, the work at his headquarters proved very different from that in Washington. In the former city facts were wanted in order that decisions as to policy might be made. At General Headquarters facts were wanted to aid in carrying out policies already formed and decisions already made. Nothing counted except end-results. The General wanted to know every day how many effective fighting men he could count on. He wanted to know where they were, what equipment they had, and what shortages existed in guns, trucks, rifles, or in other essential articles of warfare. He wanted the facts about losses and sick-rates, and he always wanted the very latest information with respect to the men landed from the ships in the last twenty-four hours and the amounts of supplies unloaded. All this information had to be accurate and absolutely up-to-date, and it all had to be placed on his desk ready for use by 8.30 each morning. It was the job of the Statistics Unit to have it there, and to create and administer a system to get it there and never fail. The summer of 1918 was a busy one for the members of the statistics units in France.

In September the writer was ordered to the front, and had the privilege of seeing something of the operations of St. Mihiel, the Argonne Forest, and certain French sectors. After that came a hurried trip to England to participate in negotiations for the British shipping, which was to have aided in carrying through America's tremendous military program for 1919. In this same month, the writer, as senior statistical officer of the A. E. F., represented the American Army in joint conferences of the representatives of all the Allied Armies, called by the Supreme War Council at Versailles, to decide what information each army should interchange with the others, and what data with respect to its own operations should regularly be furnished Marshal Foch. September was a busy month.

Early in October came an order to accompany the Secretary of War back to the United States to undertake the further organization and extension of the statistics work. This brought with it promotions in the shape of a commission as full Colonel, shortly followed by appointment as a member of the General Staff, and appointment as Chief of the Branch of the General Staff administering statistical services.

In November came new orders, this time to accompany the President to France as Chief Statistical Officer of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace. The work in Paris was intensely interesting, and it was a great privilege to have been able to participate in it. In January came a tour of duty with the Army of Occupation in Germany, and later two trips to Belgium. Then followed weeks of computing on the indemnity clauses of the treaty and the economic sections.

It proved impossible, however, to remain to the end of the peace negotiations. Late in April came new orders, this time to accompany the Secretary of War back to the United States in order to organize the material which might be needed for the expected Congressional inquiry into the conduct of the war. The time since returning has been spent in organizing these facts and in compiling the more important ones in a short statistical history published by the Government and entitled "The War with Germany — A Statistical Summary."

This brings us up to the present time, which is the end of June, 1919. Two years and three months have been spent in war service, and some further months must undoubtedly be added to this term before release from the army can be secured. The writer agrees with a friend of his in one of the combat divisions, who wrote to him from the battlefield: "It is simply scandalous how I have enjoyed this war up to date." The writer has enjoyed it also. He has been privileged to be stationed where policies were discussed and decisions made. He has seen much of history in the making. Under his direction hundreds of able men and women have worked with a singleness of mind and a devotion to duty that have been inspiring in their example. It has been a privilege to direct military statistical offices in Washington and at General Headquarters in France, at the Headquarters of the Services of Supply in France, in Paris, and at the American base in Antwerp.

If the writer could express himself with the fulness of information, combined with the economy of words, in which he has attempted to train his assistants, he could more adequately tell the story of his experiences during the past two years in the brief compass of this article. That it could be done seems proved by a cablegram and a telegram which were sent by two of the writer's junior officers, and which succeeded in expressing much in few words. The cablegram was from one of the lieutenants to his father, and it read: "Captured, escaped, wounded, convalescent." The telegram was from another lieutenant to his mother. It was sent from Hoboken, and it read: "Debarked, deloused, demobilized, delighted."

The writer, however, has not been able to say so much so briefly. He has dealt during the war with an enormous range of facts, some of them necessary and others merely contingent, some of them essential and others only incidental. The Statistics Branch of the Army has literally dealt during this war with all the elements of that improbable combination mentioned by "Alice in Wonderland." It has reported on ships, and shoes, and sealing-wax, and cabbages, and kings. It has further reported on guns, and mules, and 6-inch shells, and gas-retaining rings, and beef and bullets, tanks and bombs, and trucks and airplane wings. When peace is signed the writer will find himself in the possession of an incomparable mass of thoroughly worthless information. What he will do afterwards he does not know. He is reflecting on the essential quality of the truth expressed in Kipling's comment that "Army life is like army tobacco: it spoils a man's taste for milder things."

THE UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE FOR MASSACHUSETTS

Everett W. Lord

[Everett W. Lord, A.B. '00, A.M. '06, is Dean of the College of Business Administration of Boston University.]

IN July, 1918, Dean Lord was requested by the Massachusetts Public Safety Committee to accept an appointment under the United States Department of Labor as Federal Director of United States Employment Service for Massachusetts. The Employment Service had, by presidential proclamation, been given full control of unskilled labor in all war industries. All employers who had contracts with the Government were, by this proclamation, obliged to call upon the Employment Service, and only upon the Employment Service, for their labor, and a corresponding control of unskilled labor was thus given to the service.

Dean Lord was authorized by the University Trustees to accept this position. Since the position carried no salary, the State Public Safety Committee undertook to reimburse the University for his salary during the term of office.

The plan of organization of the Employment Service called for a local committee in every community in Massachusetts, with the organization of an employment office in every industrial center. Since the shipyards, munition plants, machine shops, and other war industries of the State were seriously in need of labor, the organization of these employment offices was pushed with great rapidity. In addition to the employment offices, more than 200 enrolling agents were appointed to recruit laborers for the varied industries. Within a few weeks after the appointment more than forty employment offices were organized, and the recruiting of labor was being carried on systematically in every community in the State. Under later authorization there was added to the jurisdiction of the Massachusetts Office the lumber camps of northern New England, especially the camps where spruce for air-planes was being cut. Several thousand laborers were sent from Massachusetts to these various camps.

A professional department with a bureau for teachers was organized early in 1919. The professional department undertook to secure engineers and other professional men and to enable men of professional training not directly employed in war industry to secure suitable employment. The Teachers' Bureau attempted both to place teachers in schools throughout New England and to secure for teachers forms of war employment for which their training fitted them.

Immediately after the armistice the work of the Employment Service was changed to that of distributing the discharged soldiers and sailors and war workers into industry. Special bureaus for placement of soldiers and sailors were established with the coöperation of such organizations as the Young Men's Christian Association, Jewish War Relief Board, and the Red Cross, and through these bureaus more than 30,000 discharged soldiers were aided to secure positions.

Several bureaus were established at Camp Devens, and under the army regulations every soldier before being discharged was required to register with the Employment Service. Even those who did not desire aid of the service were thus recorded, and in many cases it was found that men who thought they had no need for the service were obliged to call upon it for assistance.

At the request of the President of the University, Dean Lord asked to be released from the Employment Service in January, 1919, and again in March, but the Secretary of Labor so strongly urged him to continue during the period of demobilization that he withdrew his request. He continued as Federal Director until July, at which time, feeling that the need for his services was no longer urgent, he insisted that his resignation be accepted.

CHARLES W. WHITING

CHARLES W. WHITING (C. B. A. 1916–18) died of wounds in France, September 10, 1918. He was attached to the Signal Corps, Headquarters Company, 308th Infantry. He was cited for bravery and awarded the American Distinguished Service Cross. The citation read as follows:

"Private Charles W. Whiting, deceased, Headquarters Company, 308th Infantry. During the advance to the Aisne, September 10, 1918, Private Whiting was a lineman in charge of maintaining communication from Barbanvale to Blanzy. The line was under the direct observation of enemy O.P.'s, and had apparently been located as such by their observers, for although it was comparatively safe to walk a short distance away from the road along which the wire ran, the minute anyone approached the line, heavy enemy shell-fire immediately opened up. Private Whiting repaired break after break, and despite the fact that each time he started out to locate new trouble enemy one-pounders and field pieces were turned loose on the line, he courageously stuck to his work, manifesting extreme bravery and heroism throughout, until mortally wounded."

His mother, Mrs. Annie C. Battles, of Avon, Mass., received from Chaplain Halligan of the 308th Infantry the following letter:

"Your letter referring to the death of Private Charles W. Whiting of Headquarters Company, 308th Infantry, recently arrived. The notification you received was unfortunately correct. He was wounded while the regiment was engaged at the Vesle River, and died on September 10.

"Charles was very well liked by the boys of his company who knew him. He was a good soldier and is numbered among our heroes. His name shall be inscribed on the monument which we propose to erect in France, in commemoration of our noble lads, who have paid their debt of patriotism by the supreme sacrifice. He is buried in the vicinity of the hospital where he died. The place must be near Château-Thierry. His grave is registered, and in time the Government intends to return his body to the States. Then you will receive notice. Will you please accept our sincere sympathy in your sorrow. Charles was your son, but our comrade, too. We feel that on this occasion we are privileged to express our sympathy to you, and we pray that God will comfort and console — and one day bring us to a meeting with Charles in eternity."

RED CROSS REPORT, 1918–1919

College of Liberal Arts

November 9	Distribution of 700 Red Cross Brochures, showing work of Boston Metropolitan Chapter.
December 16 to December 23	Red Cross Christmas Roll-Call. C. L. A. Aux. (No. 11) worked under Mr. David B. Keniston, Chairman of Ward 7, Red Cross Committee, and got 182 members here in college. 148 had joined at home, so total Red Cross membership in C. L. A. totaled 330. 6 Volunteer Workers (Estelle Bradeen, Marion Bradford, Helen Bisbee, Marion Leavitt, Elizabeth Norton, and Marjory Seavey) from this Auxiliary worked in the House to House Campaign under Mrs. Goodhue, Chairman of Ward 8, Red Cross Committee, and collected $25.00.
October	Girls registered and promised to give at least one hour a week for Volunteer Service for the Red Cross. 86 girls joined and declared themselves willing to do Sewing, Addressing, Typewriting, or Knitting. Y. W. C. A. room fitted out for the work. Red Cross, Liberty Loan, and all sorts of War Posters made the room attractive and expressed the spirit of the work done there. Many current magazines such as the Red Cross News and the Y. M. C. A. magazine were kept on the reading-table. Room was open for workers every day, except Saturday, from nine to five.
January 11	Comfort Kits (Italian). Under the supervision of Miss Dorothy Winston, our Auxiliary filled 300 housewifes with darning needles, common needles, safety-pins, buttons, thread, hooks and eyes.
January 21	500 Kits filled.
February 20	1377 Kits filled, rolled, placed in large bags, and packed ready for shipment.
March 27	8 Volunteer Workers (Estelle Bradeen, Marion Bradford, Helen Cady, Effie Douglas, Marion Durning, Fannie Morrison, Elsie Norris, and Olive Sylvester) helped in the House to House Campaign for the Boston Dispensary, Baby Hygiene, and District Nursing Association in the Health Campaign.

April — Several girls (Elsie Norris and Alice Wilson) helped the Home Service Section of the American Red Cross by doing clerical work under the direction of Miss Davis, 755 Boylston Street, Boston.

SHERMAN SEAL BROKAW

SHERMAN SEAL BROKAW, a member of the class of 1920, College of Business Administration, was drowned in a blizzard on the night of December 12, 1917, while out on volunteer service in a rowboat off the entrance to Boston Harbor, trying to make fast a part of a submarine net. The boat in which Mr. Brokaw and his chum had gone out for duty was lost. Mr. Brokaw's body was not recovered. He was attached to the U. S. S. Shada at the time he was lost.

A bronze tablet given to St. Crysostom's Episcopal Church, of Wollaston, Mass., by Ex-Councilman and Mrs. Vernon S. Brokaw, in memory of their son, was dedicated Sunday, February 1, 1920, with special services in the church. The tablet contains, in addition to Sherman Brokaw's name, the names of forty-nine other men and four women of the church who gave their services to their country during the World War.

The tablet is surmounted by the seal of the United States of America. On the bottom is the inscription, "Greater love hath no man than this: that a man lay down his life for his friend."

IN MEMORIAM: SHERMAN SEAL BROKAW

IN memory of Sherman Seal Brokaw, of the College of Business Administration, Day Division, '20, a member of the naval reserve, who with one of his mates was lost in Boston Harbor as a result of volunteering for extra-hazardous duty during a blizzard in December, 1917, a portrait, the gift of his classmates, was unveiled and presented to the College of Business Administration at a service held Monday, April 15, 1918.

The address was given by President L. H. Murlin, who said, in part, as reported in the Boston University News for Tuesday, April 23, 1918:

"It is hard for me to speak of any one of our students as an individual, but I should like to tell you the things that I believe Brokaw would say if he were standing in my place today."

President Murlin then said that to Brokaw death was not the greatest sacrifice; he had already made that before he paid the last full measure. The great sacrifice came when he made up his mind to give himself body and soul to the service of his country — when he made ready to leave his home, friends, school, and all the promise of the future. After that nothing mattered. Death no longer was an accident; it became an incident.

"I have talked with a clergyman who had visited army camps," said President Murlin, "and he talked to them of what the future might hold for them. Then one of the soldiers, in a truly democratic manner, told him to 'can that stuff; we 're not worrying about the future.'

"A democracy is as strong as the weakest individual. It is therefore not an easy thing to live for one's country. It is hard to live in such a way that we may make ourselves worthy of the sacrifices men like Brokaw are making for us. To be worthy members of a democracy each individual must keep body, soul, and spirit in the best possible condition. Live worthily — that is the message that Brokaw would wish to give you if he were here."

Horace G. Thacker, president of the class, presented the picture, draped with an American flag. Mr. Thacker narrated the heroic manner in which Brokaw met his death. He expressed the hope that the picture would serve as a memorial and as an inspiration to future students.

Dean Everett W. Lord accepted the gift for the college. He promised that the memorial should remain where future students may see it and be inspired by its significance. He paid a tribute to Brokaw as a representative of all the students of the University who have entered the service; it was his special privilege to be the first to die, and his picture will inspire others with his spirit.

Bishop C. Hunt recited Philip Nolan's apostrophe to the flag, from Edward Everett Hale's "A Man Without a Country," and an original and anonymous poem written especially for the occasion. The poem, which was printed in the Boston University News for April 23, 1918, follows:

Spring comes and with it stir the primal joys
Of rushing brooks, song birds, and bursting buds,
Frogs piping in the meadows, and the smell
Of new-turned earth. Who would not be alive
When Massachusetts bids the snows be gone,
Mirrors the fleecy clouds in her blue lakes,
And hurries forward to the bursting rose?
The green, gray roller on the sandy beach!
The checkered sunlight of the Berkshire Hills!
Ah youth! is it not brave to be alive?
Is it not passing brave, still to be young,
And see, and hear, and smell that life is good?

Night black and cold; a sleety, winter wind
Whipped stinging spray across the vessel's deck,
Men fought the primal forces as men fought
Down the long ringing ages, and must fight
Up through the future to the bright day-star.
A tangled rudder in a heaving sea,
A young man's task to answer duty's call,
A young man's life gone in an icy sea.
Never for him the springtime and the song,
Never for him the blue of summer days,
Never for him the joy of coming home.
And though at last the thunder of the war
Is hushed in peace, and all the earth is healed,
His golden bowl is broken and the brine
Has glazed his sight. What means for him the shout
That greets our boys rejoicing home from France?
Does peace mean rest for him who is at rest?
Where 's the reward for him who gave his all?

Ah! still we know the Eternal Will is good,
And not unmarked does the lone sparrow fall.
In God's great love we leave our comrade's fate.

Is it not written large that God is good?
But you who have the beauty of your lives
And all the joy of life and youth and spring,
Like some lone traveler wandering in the dark,
Groping with doubtful steps his doubtful path,
Who sudden sees a light stab through the night
And glisten all along his destined path,
So may you in this comrade's life behold
A beacon and a light by which to steer.

The service closed with the singing of "Keep the Home Fires Burning," Professor H. Augustine Smith singing the verses and the students joining in the chorus.

WAR EMERGENCY COURSES IN BUSINESS
1917–1918

AFTER the announcement of the break with Germany, followed by the announcement of the draft, business organizations, large and small, faced the situation of labor shortage. Important and unimportant positions had to be filled immediately. Assuming that many promotions would be made, it was evident that there would be an unusually large number of vacancies in minor positions. Inexperienced help would predominate.

The educational institutions of the country had been laying great stress upon intensive training in military matters, but it was now evident that if the country was to emerge from the world war victorious, business must receive as much attention as military preparation. It remained for Boston University to aid in solving one of the biggest problems which would confront business executives within the next few months.

Under the direction of T. Lawrence Davis, who was then Secretary of the College of Business Administration, a war emergency division was organized. Without charge for tuition, this special department of the College of Business Administration offered a program of study covering eight weeks of intensive training in elementary office routine, including the rudiments of subjects that the young office assistant would find necessary. In the first session, eight hundred young women were enrolled, one section meeting in the afternoon, the other in the evening.

The work began with lectures in commercial English — in connection with which there were many practical exercises. The great task of correcting the papers was undertaken by members of the College Club of Boston, who graciously volunteered their services.

The general courses included work in the elements of commercial law, especially contracts and agencies, the practical side of banking, office organization, filing, accounting, and secretarial practice. These subjects were presented by faculty members and outside lecturers. The "Davis Secretarial Series," compiled by the director, was used as a home study text.

One class, numbering over two hundred, became proficient in the operation of calculating machines. The Monroe Calculating Machine Company of New York loaned many of its machines and furnished a corps of instructors.

The first classes were held during the hot summer weeks of 1917, yet the attendance was large and unusually regular. The second war emergency classes were organized during the spring of 1918. These classes were open to both men and women.

Commenting on this work of Boston University, the Boston Record stated in its editorial columns: "This is specific, practical, necessary war efficiency work. The nation is doing its utmost to train young men in the duty of military service. Already our army is about four times as large as it was when we entered the war. But behind all this there will be gaps that must be filled,— countless clerical and office positions, the efficient conduct of which is essential to national preparedness and national effectiveness. Our schools and colleges have a clear duty to the nation in this matter. Boston University is meeting that duty finely."

BOSTON UNIVERSITY POST 43, AMERICAN LEGION

Warren H. Hussey

[Warren H. Hussey is Adjutant, Post 43, American Legion.]

THE American Legion in Boston University had its initial impulse in June, 1919, when fifteen men in the Law School took out a charter as Massachusetts Post 43. As none of them returned to college the following September, the post became inactive and the charter was in danger of being revoked because of lack of interest on the part of the men in the University, many of whom were already members of other posts.

Late in October Mr. Ralph L. Power, Librarian at the College of Business Administration, called together all the men interested, from all departments of the University, in an attempt to revive the fast-dying Boston University Post. At this meeting on November 7 the following officers were elected:

Ralph L. Power, Commander; Richard M. Millett, Vice-Commander; Warren H. Hussey, Adjutant; Emerson J. Pierce, Finance Officer. With this skeleton organization a short drive for members was made, bringing in about sixty-five men from different departments of the University.

The greatest difficulty which the post faces is the matter of a meeting place and the meeting time. The local separation of the various departments and schools of Boston University needs no comment, as the American Legion here suffers no more than any interdepartmental organization. Many of the members are night students; the Law School operates on a time schedule different from that of the College of Business Administration; that of the College of Business Administration differs from that of the College of Liberal Arts.

However, the men who compose Post 43 feel that there is a very real place for the American Legion in Boston University, and are therefore making the best of a difficult situation.

There are three things which the Boston University Post feels it can accomplish for the man in college to a much greater extent than can any other post; of these the most obvious is naturally the social feature, keeping the former service men in touch with one another. Without some such bond the stress of study and college activity would tend inevitably to break the thread of common interest which should hold them together.

Then, again, the fact that a man has come back from the service to re-enter school should not bar him from active participation in the American Legion, as is the case with nearly every student who joins a post at home. In a university post such as this he is, on the contrary, able to take a very active interest not only in the Legion at large, but in the Legion in its relation to his particular problems as a student.

This fact of having had a practical and active interest in the

CAPTAIN PAUL W. BAADE

Legion since its start will also be of considerable advantage later when the men transfer to their home posts as members familiar with the Legion and its aims and methods, instead of then beginning to acquire interest in the Legion and knowledge of what it stands for. This is perhaps the most vital consideration for the maintenance of a post of the American Legion at Boston University.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY R. O. T. C.

Paul W. Baade

[Major Paul W. Baade is a graduate of West Point, '11. He has served in the Philippines and in nearly every section of the United States; during the World War he was Lieutenant Colonel of the 322d Infantry, 81st Division, in the Vosges Sector, and in the Meuse-Argonne Offensive.]

LEADERSHIP, the power to handle men, has always been recognized as a big asset for men in any walk of life. The advantage of such training was well known to the Trustees of Boston University, so that they readily were influenced by this fact and by their interest in national welfare to establish the R. O. T. C. in Boston University.

The establishment of an Infantry Unit of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps was authorized by the War Department on August 16, 1919, and confirmed by the President on December 23, 1919, in accordance with the authority granted by Congress in an Act of June 3, 1916. Captain (then Lieutenant Colonel) Paul W. Baade was detailed to the University on September 9, 1919, as Professor of Military Science and Tactics, and on September 19, 1919, Sergeant Major Walter Chamberlain, 1st Sergeant Frank R. Kendrick, and Sergeant Walter Moore were detailed as assistants.

Very nearly seven hundred students enrolled at the beginning of the first semester, and showed an excellent spirit under the many adverse circumstances confronting them. For example, the police strike prevented drilling out of doors until weather was too inclement, and furthermore the uniforms did not arrive until well on in the year. However, with the winter the regular, indoor drill in the South Armory commenced, and in the spring the Training Ground on Boston Common, reserved for purposes of drill from pre-Revolutionary days, was thrown open to the Unit, which held parades and other ceremonies there every Friday afternoon. Such progress had been made during the year that the University was recommended to be inspected for the rank of Distinguished University in Military Work. This designation is limited to but fifteen colleges and universities throughout the whole country each year; so that although the University did not attain the coveted honor of the award, it none the less may well be proud of being one of the few to be inspected.

The exceptional results attained in the very first year of military work are largely to be ascribed to the cadet officers, especially those who served during the World War as officers or in the ranks. They put their hearts and souls into the task, and it was due to their constant efforts that the organization was rendered practicable and lasting.

Nor can the remarkable progress of the band be overlooked, for in one year it sprang from a recruit group into a well rounded and creditable military band. In years to come, as in the past year, this one feature alone will add much to the interest and enjoyment of the student body. In fact, without it the results achieved by the Military Department would be seriously impaired.

Although the drills and ceremonies which take place on every Friday afternoon seem to the casual onlooker to be the "big thing in the course," these really form but a small part of the R. O. T. C. curriculum. The course covers a period of four years, and the student who completes the entire schedule will have received a well-grounded knowledge of the following: Personal Hygiene, Camp Sanitation, Minor Tactics, Topography and Map Reading, Signaling, Field Engineering, Message Writing, Small Arms Firing, Liaison, Common and Military Law, Military History and Economics, and all allied subjects. The purpose of the R. O. T. C. at colleges is primarily to prepare intelligent young men for Reserve Officers, so they can better serve their country in case of national emergency; the secondary object is to develop the student physically, mentally, and morally. It plans to make him an honest, chivalrous American, with plenty of initiative—one who will not shirk responsibility nor hesitate to take deserved blame.

In adding this course to the curriculum, the University offers a valuable opportunity for its student body to fit themselves better for the Battle of Life.

A WAR WORK ENDED

THE Cercle Français of the College of Liberal Arts officially closed its war work when on December 19, 1919, the records of its Paris charity, L'Œuvre des Petits Blessés, were presented to the college library. The records consist of a history of the charity itself and of the various benevolent activities which helped provide it with funds for its maintenance, the enterprises undertaken in its behalf by the Cercle Français, and a very interesting collection of letters from the French soldiers who were guests of the Œuvre during the four years in which it conducted its rest house at 21 Rue Valette, Paris. These documents have been neatly bound in a portfolio volume, and will form a valuable historical record.

The presentation was made at a College Assembly by Miss Angelina Funai, '20, former president of the Cercle. The gift was received by Dean W. M. Warren for the University. Following this ceremony an address was delivered by Captain André Morize on certain salient differences between educational institutions of France and those of the United States.
